the same object in view, but differ only in the mode of attaining it? Why persevere in an adherence to form, at the risk of the substance? Mr. M. said he was not endeavoring to persuade honorable gentlemen to a course which he himself would not adopt. He was ready to prove the sincerity of his profession by his vote; for believing as he did most conscientiously, that the compensation under the old law was inadequate, if all attempts to fill the blanks in this bill with a reasonable daily allowance shall fail, Mr. M. said, he should most certainly vote against the repeal of the law of the last session, and especially if it was connected with a repeal of all laws upon this subject. He deprecated the idea, that each Congress was to fix the compensation of its members. It was throwing the apple of discord into every succeeding Congress, at its outset, and it was holding up a seat in this House as a prize to the most noisy brawler of economy, a prize upon which every election would generally be struck off to the lowest bidder. By a conciliatory course, in regard as well to the precise sum as the mode, much future evil may now be avoided. The dignity of the House, as well as the great interests of the people, requires that something permanent should now be accomplished, and that the public mind should no longer be agitated by this disgusting subject.

In the course of this discussion, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. M., honorable gentlemen have thought proper to indulge themselves in speculations upon the nature and theory of our Government, upon the rights of the people, and the duties of their Representatives; and I have been not a little astonished and alarmed at some of the doctrines that have been advanced on this occasion. These doctrines, however, have been so ably combatted by the arguments of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that I do not feel myself at liberty to occupy the time and attention of the House at any considerable length, with remarks upon a subject to which he has done such ample justice. But, sir, I must be permitted to notice some of the extraordinary positions taken by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) who addressed you on Saturday, positions as dangerous as they are untenable, and as directly opposed to the nature of our representative Government as to the great principles of civil liberty.

That gentleman has told us that "in this country the people are the sovereign power; that they can do no wrong; that in regard to the compensation law, their voice has been heard in favor of its repeal, and this voice we are bound to obey." And is it, indeed, so, sir? Do we live under the unstable and fluctuating government of a wild and furious democracy, and are our great and essential rights and privileges, everything that can endear society, and render life valuable, held at the mercy of a capricious multitude? No, sir, this is not our situation. All power indeed is originally derived from the people, and is to be exercised for their good, by the several branches of the Government, in the way pointed out by the Constitution; but, in the rightful exercise of the powers thus delegated by the people, the Government of the United States is as sovereign and independent as the Crown of Great Britain. True, the people of this country have retained in their hands, and the Constitution has guarantied to them the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges consistent with a well regulated society. But, sir, the great and essential attributes of sovereignty they have, by solemn compact, voluntarily surrendered to a government established by themselves; and so long as that compact exists, these attributes cannot be resumed.

The people have thus wisely provided for their own security and protection, by the creation of mounds and barriers against the inroads of usurpation and licentiousness. The constitutions, the laws, the institutions of your country, are the great safeguards of your liberty and the rights of the people.

But, says the gentleman, "the voice of the people is always right, and must be implicitly obeyed"—"Vox populi, vox Dei"—"the voice of the people is the voice of God," is a maxim which, by a perversion of its true meaning, has become more fallacious in principle, and more dangerous in its consequences, than any other which the frenzy of political madness can conceive. It has prostrated the wisdom of ages, and drenched the earth with the blood of its inhabitants. In one respect, indeed, does the "voice of the people" sometimes resemble the "voice of the Almighty," in the terror of its power," rather than the perfection of its wisdom. It is the voice which speaks in the thunder, the earthquake, the tornado. It carries ruin, and havoc, and desolation in its train. It sometimes subverts the deep foundations on which the great pillars of morality and order are erected, and introduces universal anarchy and confusion, the reign "of chaos and old night," in their stead. History is full of instruction upon this subject. "The voice of the people" banished Aristides from the councils of Athens, and drove Camillus from employment at Rome. "The voice of the people" has been made the apology for every outrage and every enormity. Look at modern Europe; see there its progress, written in blood. Revolutions, the most bloody, and massacres, the most cruel, have been sanctioned by the pretended "voice of the people," and the wisdom, and virtue, and talents of a nation have been buried beneath the ruins of the tempest which this voice has excited. Philosophers and demagogues, atheists and tyrants, each in their turn have summoned to their aid this powerful auxiliary to demoralize, degrade, and enslave mankind.

These enormities the gentleman from North Carolina would, I know, be the last to justify. But let him remember they were all committed under the sanction of this dangerous maxim. Is then this voice, which is more frequently made to echo the wishes of ambitious and unprincipled demagogues, than the cool and deliberate opinions of the people, always to be obeyed? Is the Representative to surrender the convictions of his own mind, the dictates of his conscience and his judgment, to the decisions of a tribunal so liable to misapprehension and error? No, sir; he has a high and exalted part to perform, and his duty to his God and his country, alike require him to listen to the "still small voice" of reason and conscience, and leave the event to Heaven. Not to desert his post in the hour of danger, but manfully to breast himself against the torrent to save the people from the consequences of their own errors, and to sacrifice, if necessary, his love of popularity to his love of justice. This, sir, was the course pursued by our political father, at a most interesting period of our history. When the French Revolution burst upon the astonished world, we all know it was hailed by the "voice of the people" in this country, as the dawning of a glorious day of freedom, and the harbinger of hope and joy to suffering nations. Every effort of reason, and every impulse of feeling, were enlisted in favor of those who, as we vainly believed, were contending for the rights which we so richly enjoyed. The enthusiasm spread with the rapidity of lightning, from one extremity of the continent to the other, and the Government and the people were openly called upon to make a common cause, with a nation contending in the cause of liberty, against the combined despots of Europe. What then was the conduct of WASHINGTON? Did he feel himself bound to obey the "voice of the people," thus audibly pronounced? No, sir; he looked to the permanent interest, and not the temporary wishes, of the people. To secure this object, he put at hazard the fame of a whole life devoted to the service of his country. He issued his proclamation of neutrality, and the stormy waves of popular commotion were dashed back upon themselves. Had he yielded to the clamor of the moment, or, as it was then called, the "voice of the people," we too should have been drawn into that vortex which, at one period, had well nigh engulfed and destroyed the liberties of the world.

At a subsequent period, too, sir, when the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay, with the British Government, was before Congress, had the Representatives then surrendered their judgment to the misguided "voice of the people," the treaty would not have been carried into effect, and all the important benefits which, for a course of years, resulted from it would have been lost to the nation.

Upon this subject, Mr. Speaker, I beg not to be misunderstood or misrepresented. To the calm, deliberate, and dispassionate opinion of the people, coolly expressed, upon a subject fairly before them, with a full knowledge of all the facts necessary to enable them to come to a decision, I should most certainly, upon all occasions, pay the utmost deference and respect, and, unless opposed to my sober convictions and deliberate judgment, should sanction it by my vote. Do gentlemen believe that, in the case before us, the honest yeomanry of the interior have been in possession of all the facts and circumstances necessary to come to a correct result? That they understood the provisions of the law, the construction which had been put upon it, and, above all, the reasons and facts upon which it was founded? But, sir, I am reminded by gentlemen of the proceedings of the Massachusetts Legislature upon this subject. Sir, I shall not upon this occasion, nor, I trust, upon any other, on this floor, speak of the proceedings of that Legislature in any other terms than those of respect; but I do exceedingly regret that this should have been considered a proper subject for State interference; and how far the remarks I have just made will apply to the members of that honorable body, I leave to their candor to decide. In the purity of their motives and the integrity of their intentions I have the most perfect confidence; but as their request to me upon this occasion is unaccompanied by the reasons which induced it, I must be permitted, after giving that request all the consideration to which, from its respectable origin, it is entitled, to follow the honest convictions of my own judgment. In coming to the decision which they formed upon this question, they undoubtedly sought information from the best sources within their reach; and when I am told that the only member of that Legislature whose recent services in Congress could enable him to give them any practical information had long been of opinion, and contended, as some honorable gentlemen do here, that indemnity for expenses incurred, and not compensation for services rendered, was all that should be attempted, that six dollars a day was amply sufficient for that purpose; and when I call to mind the well-merited influence which that highly respectable gentleman enjoys in that Legislature, I am by no means surprised at the result of their deliberations. But, sir, when I find another honorable member of that Legislature, who, as commissioner of boundary, is in the annual receipt of nearly five thousand dollars from your Treasury, for services which he has never yet performed, complaining of the extravagant compensation allowed to members of Congress, for all their services, privations, and sacrifices, I am at some loss to account for his patriotic efforts in this behalf. One fact, however, is worthy of remark: at the late Congressional election in Massachusetts, he was the candidate in opposition to my honorable colleague (Mr. KING) who voted in favor of the law of the last session, and he succeeded in his election. But, sir, I have protracted my remarks much beyond my intention when I rose. I beg pardon for the time I have occupied, and am grateful to the House and the Chair for the attention I have received.

Mr. WENDOVER, of New York, said, at the last session, when the act passed, which the bill now before the House proposed to repeal, he gave a silent vote; that vote he since had, and now did regret, not because he deemed the amount too great, but because he did not then, nor did he now, like the mode; and he did believe, had the members generally expressed their sentiments, the mode would not have obtained.

I had intended on this occasion, said Mr. W., as on the former, to give my vote without trou-ling the House with any remarks; but we have heard so much on the doctrine of instruction, and heard it stated in almost as many points of view as have been the attempts to define it, that it becomes us to know, if we are bound by instructions, what these instructions are. I did not hear the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) on this subject; I regret that other public duties required a temporary absence.

Sir, I have no instructions; had I believed I was sent here to legislate by instructions, except by those I find in the Constitution and the principles of our Republican Government, and could I have adopted the doctrine of instruction as laid down by some gentlemen on this floor, I should have demanded of my constituents to remain in perpetual session, either in bulk or by proxy, and send me my instructions from day to day, as I might be called to act; and, also, instruct me how to vote, when I had, in other respects, acted under such instructions. But, sir, if my constituents believed I could maturely think one way and vote another, I am happy on my own account that they are mistaken, and sorry on their account they should wish for such a Representative; on such conditions I cannot serve them.

Sir, it is because we appear to think one way and act another, that I am opposed to this bill, if it assumes the character it got in the Committee of the Whole; and if so, it, nor its advocates, shall ever boast the aid of my vote or feeble efforts in procuring its passage into a law.

Sir, is this simply a question of dollars and cents between us and our constituents? It may be so in the estimation of some, but I hope no honorable gentleman on this floor is so sordid as to be influenced in his vote by what he shall receive here—but what is a reasonable stipend for the services of members of Congress—I will not call it a compensation; it is not a compensation, what you are about to reduce. No, sir, this is a question between the people and themselves; or, if you please, between them and their Representatives, not only in this Congress, but succeeding Congresses for years to come; and a question, in my humble apprehension, on which will depend the important result, whether you will compel the people to select for their Representatives nabobs for their opulence, or mendicants through their wants; or whether they shall have recourse to the mass of the population, and select those of the best talents in the nation to enact their laws. Gentlemen will pardon me—I wish not, Mr. Speaker, to be understood as including myself with those I have last mentioned. No, sir, the war which, under Providence, happily gave liberty to my country, unfortunately deprived me of opportunities which gentlemen around me have enjoyed.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) has told us, in his theory of instruction, "that we are bound hand and foot." I had thought this was a Representative Government—I believe it is so. What is a Representative? One exhibiting the likeness of another; one exercising the vicarious or delegated power given by another. But if the doctrine of the gentleman be correct, we have no delegated power; for, if such power existed with us, it must have been delegated for some valuable purpose, and ought to be exercised conformably to the best understanding and settled conviction of the Representative.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) has said, "the people cannot be wrong in theory or practice." This position has been weighed by my honorable colleague, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) and found wanting. I shall only add, in applying the doctrine, that if the act you are about to repeal be wrong in the estimation of the people, they have acted unwisely, and consequently wrong, in delegating their powers to us; for we have not only, in passing it, shown no likeness to the people, as we enacted it, but I fear we shall prove, in the sequel, that we are still more fallible, and can be, as well as do wrong. We may, however, have the consoling reflection, that we are not wrong in every point of view; for, with very little exception, all our theories expressed on this floor, on this subject, are, that six dollars per diem is quite too little, but yet we must not—we ought not—we dare not take more. But, sir, why are we not to receive more than six dollars per day? Why, because six dollars was fixed in 1789, when all admit it was equal to, if not more than twelve dollars now. This is an anomaly in legislation; it is to me altogether irreconcilable. It is a new light on the subject of legislation I cannot comprehend, and, if it be a true light, I hope we shall profit by its appearance.

But, say gentlemen, we must reduce the pay to six dollars per day, because we have instructions from our constituents. Now, if this be the fact, and we must obey, we may be compared to galley slaves, rowing one way but looking another; or perhaps we are more aptly to be compared to the French Council of Five Hundred, when Bonaparte returned from Egypt; like them we are legislating by the power of the people, but the throng without, in hostile array, demand a surrender—a situation in which I hope never to see an American Congress.

Sir, how stands the facts to which I have referred? We need not go to the private chambers of the honorable members of this House, to inquire their opinions as to the amount of the present compensation; they have been fully expressed in this debate.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) who first brought up this subject, in a long, consistent, and argumentative speech, proved, incontestably, that the amount of pay was not too great, in any point of view; but, acting with candor and honor as he always acts, he was willing to give up his impressions, if wrong, and let the subject undergo a new investigation; that the power which created the law might retain, modify, or repeal it.

What are we taught by the able report of the select committee? How many members of this House have omitted to declare that the arguments of the committee are unanswerable? If I have heard of a few such, I pledge myself they are few indeed. What has been the theme on this floor? I need not state it; it is too well known; in opinion we differ little, in our votes we differ much.

Now, sir, what are the instructions received? They are not general, they are not definite, but they are various; yes, and in some respects, they are very loud; and I may add, as I shall by-and-by show, they are feeling too. Where did they originate? With an editor of a party paper, who had been a member of this House, and while here, as I am well informed, was very desirous Congress should receive a greater compensation, and who, in April last, after his great efforts to denounce the law as a party measure, and even before the election on which his resolutions were intended to operate, declared, he thought the law intended members to receive the $1,500, whether they attended all the session, or only a part of it! Next they were promulgated by another printer, who sought a new weapon, hoping, "by heaps upon heaps," to slay his political enemies; and who, with his editorial opinion and labors, denounced the compensation law, as allowing too much, while he acknowledged to his friends that, in his private opinion, it ought to have been not less than twenty-five hundred dollars.

One honorable gentleman had in his pocket legislative instructions to repeal the law; another is indicted by a grand jury for voting for it. I have no legislative instructions, and, if we are to be governed by these, it is but fair, as the Legislature of my State is now in session, I should be excused from voting for six dollars till I should hear from them; should I get such instructions, I will treat the instructors with respect; but their instructions, if they do not coincide with my views of propriety, shall pass for a thing of naught. If I am to be governed by the indictment of a grand jury, knowing our grand juries in New York have lately had more urgent business, I wish to defer a decision on the question pending, till they shall have time to attend to my case; and if they only charge me with voting for the act of last session, they need no witnesses—I shall plead guilty.

If we are to take local instructions as our guide, at least one of my honorable colleagues is placed in a still more awkward situation than myself, unless, as in the present proceedings of this House, he is to infer that the minority of the people speak the public voice. At a recent town meeting in his district, composed of I know not how many, perhaps ten or fifteen, possibly twenty-five, they resolved—

"That we decidedly disapprove of the conduct of the members of our State and National Legislatures, in the passage of the compensation and salary laws, and we consider all those who were engaged in aiding or advocating those measures, and who still persist in the same opinions, as unworthy of public confidence.

"Resolved, That our delegates to the county convention be instructed to use their endeavors to procure an expression of the sentiments of that meeting on the above subject."

Sir, these delegates were true to their trust; six at least attended the county meeting; they used their endeavors, and the result was, to use the phraseology of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HULBERT,) the six delegates voted unanimously for their resolution, and the residue of the meeting, fifty-four in number, voted unanimously against it. Must I retract what I have said? If I could subscribe to the doctrines of some gentlemen in this House, I should now say I have instructions; and should these patriotic delegates, disappointed in their own district, travel till they meet and confer with the grand jury who indicted my honorable friend on my left, (Mr. PARRIS,) I almost suspect he will have another count in his indictment; for, in addition to voting for the obnoxious law, they would find his opinion as to the amount still unchanged.

Sir, I had hoped the rights of conscience, and, consequently, the right of opinion, was settled in this country; and that in civil and political, as well as in matters of religion, conscience and opinion were left unshackled. If these are the instructions to govern our conduct, they are pointed and extensive. I know not if the President and Senate still hold the same opinions they did when they passed the law; if they do, and I know the members generally of this House do, (whatever be the fate of the bill on your table,) we are all levelled at a blow. I know not the opinions of the Heads of Departments, but, if their opinions coincide with ours, we may apply the old proverb—"misery likes company."

I know not these denouncing delegates—they may be very good men; but I am informed at least one of them had but just come over from the opposite political sect, and no marvel if he at least should perform some great work of supererogation, to prove himself an old patriot in a new cause.

But where, Mr. Speaker, shall we who have no instructions on this subject go to seek them? Will gentlemen who take theirs from their own districts tell us we must go abroad to seek ours? for they insist on it, we are instructed to repeal the law, and of course to settle down at six dollars per day. Shall we go to Indiana for our instructions? Oh yes, the first act of her patriotism, (I mean no dishonorable reflection, I respect the new States as much as the old,) but before she is admitted a member of the Union, she instructs her Senators and Representatives to repeal the compensation law. Sir, this is not the first time we have heard of an infant making a great noise, before it was introduced to the other members of the family to which it belonged.

But why should Indiana instruct us? Why, the honorable gentleman (Mr. HENDRICKS) informs us, there they have corn at about twenty or twenty-five cents per bushel. Yes, sir, we hear there is corn in a far country, and here and in New York we are nearly in want of it; but we cannot all go from our Canaan to Indiana to fetch corn; and, should we make the attempt, I fear the four hundred and fifty dollars, saved by the calculation of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DESHA,) would fall short of enabling us to feed our wives, and our little ones, even on hominy, while we are here legislating for a generous and just, yes, and a magnanimous people; a people abundantly able, and, to their honor be it spoken, perfectly willing to allow their public agents, or servants if you please, a reasonable compensation for their services; and when they have the information on this subject, possessed by this House, will pronounce the present compensation quite little enough. Sir, I cannot consent to this mode of treating our families. If we cannot bring them here to live on the plentiful things of this abounding metropolis, let us take the hint of my honorable friend from South Carolina, formerly given on this subject, and "live on brown bread and cider," and thereby be enabled to carry with us home a little larger sum than four hundred and fifty dollars.

But, sir, I do not like the doctrine of the gentleman from Virginia, that we should legislate bound hand and foot. If his position be correct, we are indeed not only bound hand and foot, but head and neck too. I bow with reverence to the voice of the people; they are the rightful sovereign, and shall on all proper occasions be obeyed by me, while I have the honor to be their Representative; but when I am to pursue their opinion, I wish that opinion maturely and understandingly given. But I can conceive of many cases that might arise, in which I should not obey their instructions, however clearly expressed. I will only state one: suppose the Senate to pass a bill, and while pending in this House, new information should be obtained, from which it was evident, that its passage would subjugate your country; and the people, not possessing that information, should locally or generally instruct us to pass the bill; would the gentleman from Virginia vote for it? I hope not; at least my name should be recorded in the negative. Such cases might arise in relation to treaties or otherwise. Nay, sir, in cases less strong, I should dare to disobey the voice of my constituents, and that gentleman's too.

Sir, I believe with another gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that there are cases in which we might with propriety instruct our constituents; and I am not sure that, in this case they would be benefited, for well I know they have no idea of the sacrifices that must be made by a very large proportion of those who come here to legislate. But gentlemen say we must come from pure patriotism; the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FINDLEY) has put this subject in so clear a point of view, I should do injustice to say anything on it.

But, sir, many of my honorable colleagues say in their speeches, and by their votes, we ought to serve for six dollars per day. Why this sacrifice on the altar of patriotism? Who has required this at our hands? One of the gentlemen (Mr. TAYLOR) has told us, if I understood him, that a lawyer in the State of New York in moderate business, can make ten thousand dollars per annum by his profession—and that a county lawyer's clerk can earn for his employer twenty dollars per day, with writing by the folio; and yet such lawyers, and others in business equally profitable, must have the self-denial to serve here for a sum not equal to one-third of the earnings of a county lawyer's clerk.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have had no instructions from New York to exercise this unparalleled self-denial; I know we have had an excitement in some districts, and from one of them we have all been denounced as "unworthy of public confidence;" and had the county meeting been as vociferous as the town delegates, we should have seen a sad commentary on the doctrine of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TYLER,) that "we are elected from districts, for the purpose only of collecting the views of the people." I protest against at least some of the views of these delegates, and wish never to see such views find a passport to this House.

But, sir, I would suggest to my honorable colleagues, as we have no precept from our State, directing us to reduce the compensation to six dollars per day, that we follow at least in part a good example, and tell our constituents we had no better data on which to give our votes, than their own acts. A number of my colleagues have been in the Legislature of that State; they know its concerns, and its public spirit. How do we find facts on that alarming subject of compensation? Why, sir, but a few years ago, the members of the Legislature received per day two dollars and fifty cents; now five dollars:

The Governor of the State receives per annum	$7,000
Chancellor	4,500
Judges of the Supreme Court	4,300
Comptroller	2,500
Secretary of State	2,000
Treasurer	1,700
Surveyor General	2,000
And the Mayor of the city of New York	7,500

I need add no more. Other officers in that State receive in proportion. I shall say little about the legal charges of lawyers. My colleague has thrown a light on this subject, which the statute book fully confirms. We generally have enough lawyers in the Legislature of that State; but I never heard them, in fixing their fees, propose to be governed by such disinterested patriotism. But members of Congress must come from that State, say some of my colleagues, and serve for six dollars per day, and that too from sheer patriotism. Yes, sir, abandon their business, and serve here for a pittance, and, after an absence of from four to seven months, return home to their families with four hundred and fifty dollars in their pockets, and tell their children: I am not wealthy; I had heretofore laid up for your benefit a little property; but a rich people have honored me with a seat in Congress, and told me to take from their funds enough to make me something like a reasonable compensation, not for sacrifices, but for services; but, being a patriot, I would take no more than four hundred and fifty dollars, after deducting from my pay the bare cost of my necessary diet, and unavoidable expenses, while at the Seat of Government;—and their children may respond: my father was once prosperous in business; he loved his home, and his family; but he was honored by his fellow-citizens to a seat in Congress; he loved his country, but through a mistaken zeal to prove his patriotism, he has blasted my hopes, and left me in poverty.

Sir, I ask the gentleman to look at this subject, and if they really believe we are in duty bound to place any in a situation that such sacrifices are inevitable, when the people are able and willing to bear at least a part of the losses? If the people think we, as individuals, do not deserve it, they have the staff in their own hands, and happy is their lot, they can be served by such as they may think fit for the purpose.

Sir, I am one of the fortunates, or unfortunates, returned for the fifteenth Congress. I feel myself honored by the voice of my fellow-citizens. I wish I was more deserving that honor, and better qualified for the duties of the station. But if we are to legislate as some gentlemen have contended, I crave not that honor. I cannot vote for a measure which to me does not appear to be dictated by sound policy, and promotive of public good; and, while I honor the candor, and appreciate the views of the gentlemen on the other side of the question, I will not forego the pleasure to reflect that I am delegated by a people too just and too magnanimous to withhold from their Representatives the pitiful addition to the pay fixed six-and-twenty years ago; which, divided among them, will not exceed one cent and three mills each per annum. Sir, I have voted for ten dollars, with a view to fix the mileage at six dollars. Sir, I voted for nine dollars, with the same view. I shall now vote for eight dollars, agreeably to the report of the select committee. For a less sum I will not vote this session.

Mr. TAUL, of Kentucky, observed, that, in rising to address the House, at the present protracted period of the discussion, some apology was probably due for the intrusion. That apology was to be found in the very extraordinary course which the debate had taken. He understood from the Chair, that the immediate question before the House was, on filling the first blank in the bill with eight dollars. Gentlemen, instead of confining themselves to the question under consideration, have gone at length into the discussion of the "right of the people to instruct their Representatives, and the duty of a Representative receiving such instructions," or whether it was the duty of a Representative, in voting upon this or any other question, to be governed by what he conceived to be the will of his constituents? Holding the affirmative of both those propositions, and finding them attacked with so much zeal and ability, he could not sit by and give a silent vote; although it had been his determination to do so, when this subject was first brought before the House. He should vote for repealing the law of the last session, provided the proposed substitute pleased him. He was free to confess that, in doing so, he was measurably influenced by what he conceived to be the settled and determined will of his constituents. Repealing a law, or giving a vote different at one session from what he may have given at a preceding one, carried no terrors to his mind. Neither did the fear of incurring the imputations mentioned by a gentleman from Massachusetts, carry any terrors to his mind. He thought it no act of cowardice, either personal or political, to obey the will of those who sent him here. On the contrary, he conceived it to be his bounden duty to do so, particularly in relation to the subject under consideration. "I do not purpose troubling the House with what has been aptly termed an 'experience.' We have heard a sufficiency of those disgusting relations.

Gentlemen from other States have informed you of the heat which prevailed, and the workings of the public mind in Kentucky. An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PAR-RIS) has had reference to it, not certainly with any other view than that of showing that the law of last session was not approved of by the people. Another honorable gentleman (Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee,) has also given you a very particular account of it. And although Kentucky and Tennessee are in about the same political as well as geographical latitude, it would seem, according to that gentleman, that all the heat they had in that State was borrowed from Kentucky. As I have a great regard for the State which that gentleman represents in part, and the peace and happiness of its citizens, I regret exceedingly the mischief which was occasioned by the unfavorable season in Kentucky. It produced in Tennessee, it seems, considerable excitement, and threw the public mind into a high state of fermentation; and, what was worse than all, it detached the ladies, who, he tells us, influence the elections in Tennessee, from the interest of that gentleman. That honorable gentleman knows that I respect him highly, and he will therefore believe me when I say, that I most sincerely regret that unfortunate circumstance. I however hope that the honorable gentleman, by his zeal, activity, and useful services during the present session, will be enabled to reinstate himself in the good opinion of his former female friends; at least of some one of the fairest of them, that he may change his present condition while it is "to-day" with him.

Gentlemen, sir, have levelled all the artillery of their wit and eloquence against the proposition contended for. One honorable gentleman (Mr. GROSVENOR) particularly, has indulged himself in an asperity of remark and severity of sarcasm, for which he is most happily suited; he has made comparisons, which, if he intended to be personal, might be considered offensive. [Here Mr. GROSVENOR disclaimed having allusion to any particular members.] Mr. T. proceeded, and observed, that he supposed the gentleman's sense of propriety and regard for Parliamentary decorum would restrain him from any remarks of a personal nature calculated to wound the feelings of any member of the House. He would take the liberty, however, of observing, that comparisons are always odious. The arguments of gentlemen had come far short of convincing him that he was in an error, and he was certainly not to be ridiculed out of his opinions. The gentleman from New York had undertaken to give a most disgusting and ludicrous picture of the citizens meeting together to consult upon matters of a public nature. A demagogue mounted upon a stump, addressing them; one wire for a yea, another for a nay, a third for a yes, and a fourth for a no, &c.; hats and greasy caps flying; and then he comes out upon us with his eagle and buzzard. The gentleman, sir, has danced on the finely-wrought wires of his own rich and exuberant fancy this most incongruous group of figures through all the mazes of metaphorical confusion.

We are attempted (said Mr. T.) to be arrested at the threshold of this business by a call for our instructions. Do gentlemen suppose that written instructions are to come into this House, with all those evidences of authenticity which are required in courts of justice in relation to foreign records and instruments from a foreign country? No gentleman has pretended that written instructions are necessary. I have only to observe in relation to myself, it is perfectly immaterial to me how I ascertain the wishes of my constituents; this is a matter altogether between the Representative and the Electors. Public sentiment can be ascertained in various ways, among others that of personal intercourse with the people. There is another way in which it is ascertained, that is not always very pleasant to the Representative. If I am sensible of the fact, I shall not except to the evidence of it. The Representative alone is to be the judge of that evidence. While I claim for myself the right of giving my vote, by my own conceptions of duty, I am certainly willing to accord the same right to others. If gentlemen choose to disregard the public voice, or the wishes and feelings of their constituents, it is not for me to rise up in my place and say, Sir, why do you this thing? And I protest against the right of gentlemen to interfere between my constituents and myself.

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) who addressed you on Saturday, held up to your view the Constitution of the United States, and, with a triumphant tone and manner, asked in what part of that instrument this right of the people to instruct their Representatives is to be found. Here, sir, at the outset, we are at issue. It is not to the scrip of parchment on which the Constitution was originally enrolled, that we are to look for the people's rights. Instead of looking to that instrument for the people's rights, it is there you must search for your powers. It is in that instrument the people have told you what they have given; and such powers as they have not there given, they have expressly retained. The people have not granted away all their powers, but have made a special grant for purposes particularly defined and enumerated. Previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States they were citizens of separate sovereign, and independent States, in the constitutions of which their rights were particularly defined and perfectly understood. Indeed, whether as citizens of the several States, or of the United States, they are at liberty to do that which is not prohibited. If you wish the people not to exercise this right, call upon them to give it up. To illustrate my position: In Great Britain the sovereign power is acknowledged to be in the Prince, who has been pleased, from time to time, to give up parts of his absolute sovereignty in favor of his subjects. The rights of the people, to be found in what they call their Constitution, have been extorted from their source of sovereignty. Very different here; the people are acknowledged to be the source of all power. I can then confidently call upon gentlemen in the opposition to put their finger upon that clause of the Constitution where the people have given up this right.

Gentlemen have referred to Edmund Burke, of England, as a high authority in opposition to the principle contended for. Sir, to Mr. Burke I will oppose his constituents, who, because he disregarded their will, refused to re-elect him. I consider them full as good authority as Mr. Burke himself. Sir William Blackstone, in his Commentaries on the Laws of England, says the members of the British House of Commons are not bound (as in the United Provinces) to vote the will of their constituents; and what reason does he assign? "It would be contrary to the terms of the King's writ." As this is the only reason assigned, I presume it is the best Sir William could advance in support of his position; and what is it? The "sovereign power (the King) called upon them to meet in Parliament, and give him advice." The sovereign power in this country (the people) send them with their advice. He says, or at least admits, that a member of the legislative body in the United Provinces (the Government of which country, at the time he wrote, was very similar to ours) was bound to vote the will of his constituents. It is true he does not assign any particular reason. The reason, however, is obvious: they had a Republican Government; the people were the source of power and authority. If Edmund Burke and Sir William Blackstone are considered as high English authorities, in opposition to the principle for which I contend, other English authorities, equally respectable, and in point, might be cited in favor of it. My friend from Virginia (Mr. TYLER) referred you on Saturday to one which I consider infinitely superior to them both, and Lord Chatham to boot—I mean the immortal Algernon Sidney. The remarks of Burgh, in his "Political Disquisitions," are very forcible: "If the members of the House of Commons are not obliged to regard the instructions of their constituents, the people of England choose a set of despots every seven years, and are as perfect slaves as the Turks, except the few months of a general election."

Might I not be permitted to say, with Burgh, "If the members of Congress are not bound to obey the will of their constituents, the people of the United States are perfect slaves, and are only free during the short period of the election?" Certainly our fathers did not intend this. But, sir, I wish not to appeal to English jurists, statesmen, or politicians, for an exposition of our Constitution. Thank God we are competent to that task ourselves. Those great men who lived when it was adopted, understood it best. What says the venerable Judge Tucker, of Virginia, in relation to the duty of a Representative in our Government? I regret exceedingly that I have not been able to lay my hands on his edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, where he examines and investigates this question with that ability which distinguishes him on all subjects on which he speaks or writes; and where he lays it down as the bounden and indispensable duty of the Representative to vote the will of his constituents. He does not stop to inquire about the right of the people to instruct. He doubtless supposed the right could not be questioned.

We have heard a great deal about demagogues, trimmers, time-servers, popularity hunters, &c. I am not ashamed of holding the same opinions which were held by that great man. He was no demagogue, no popularity hunter, other than that which he expected to reap from great and good actions. What he has written on this subject will not be considered the ravings of disappointed ambition, or the frantic howlings of a factious jacobin; but the grave, serious, solemn, deliberate opinion of an enlightened philosopher, a warm-hearted philanthropist, an eminent statesman and profound lawyer. His sentiments were delivered in the form of lectures to the students of William and Mary, in Virginia, in which institution he was professor of law. His object was to give to those, whose instruction was confided to his care, a correct knowledge of the Constitution and laws of the country. No purpose of party or of faction were to be answered by inculcating the doctrines alluded to.

I have contended, that this right and duty grows out of the very nature of the Government. I am bold to say, that it was so understood, at the time of the adoption of the several State constitutions, or why is it provided, in many of them, that the people have a right to assemble together, consult upon the common good, and "instruct the Representatives." Certainly the word "instruct" has a very different meaning from "request;" it implies the power of commanding obedience. The best expositors have it "to teach, to form by precept, to inform authoritatively."

Sir, in the constitutions of Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Vermont, and probably in several others, the right of the people to "instruct the Representatives" is expressly recognised. Certainly the framers of those instruments considered it to be the duty of a Representative to obey such instructions. Would a Representative of the people, in the Legislature of North Carolina, sworn to support the constitution, consider himself at liberty to depart from instructions? I would argue, that the character given in the different constitutions to the members of the Legislative department of their Governments; is strongly in favor of my position. In some of them "trustees and servants." In others "trustees and agents." Gentlemen have emphatically asked, shall we be considered as mere "agents." Sir, our fathers were "high-minded" men, but they were not ashamed of the appellation of "agents." I am fearful we will become too much so, too "high-minded." I beg leave to refer the House, and particularly the honorable gentleman from New York, to the style of the laws in that State. The constitution of the State of New York provides, that the style of all laws shall be, "Be it enacted, by the people of the State of New York, in Senate and Assembly represented." The convention of that State certainly calculated, that the Senate and Assembly, in the enactment of laws, in the name of the people, would be governed by the voice of the people. I ask, if a majority of the Senate and Assembly might not as individuals entertain opinions diametrically opposite to nineteen-twentieths of the people? What a mockery of the people to enact laws in their name, for their oppression, or against which they are decidedly opposed. Yes, sir, full as great a mockery as that which was made of the name of the King in England by the Parliament previous to the commencement of the civil war, in the reign of Charles I. The Parliament assumed executive powers, issued orders to the army, militia, navy, &c., in the name of the King, directing them to obey the orders of the King signified by his Parliament. In the one case, the name of the monarch was used for the subversion of the monarchy—in the other, the name of the people would be used for the oppression of the people.

I have contended, that this right of the people, and duty of the Representative, grows out of the very nature of our Government; and that it was so understood at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Gentlemen are much in the habit of informing you of the "schools" in which they were educated. I acknowledge that I have drawn my political creed from the "Ancient Dominion." If I am in error on this subject, then were Madison, Henry, Wythe, Mason, Grayson, Pendleton, Tyler, and the list of worthies who composed the Virginia Convention, which adopted the Federal Constitution, wrong; for we are expressly informed by the history of their proceedings, that, although they differed about subordinate expedients, yet in relation to the fundamental principles of the Constitution, the sanctity of the will of the people, the interminable inviolability of the rights of man, there was but one sentiment, but one voice.

Not willing that the Constitution should go out of their hands, without expressing their opinion on the great and fundamental principles of Government, and the rights of the people, they attached to the Constitution "A bill of rights," in which, among other things, they have declared, "that the people have a right peaceably to assemble together, to consult for the common good, or to instruct their Representatives, and that every freeman has a right to petition the Legislature for a redress of grievances." Such were their views upon the subject. "The people have a right to instruct their Representatives." "A single individual citizen has a right to petition." If the members of the Virginia Convention merit the appellation of demagogues, then I am willing to be so called. An honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) some years since on this floor (I was not then a member, but I recollect reading his speech) observed, in reply to one or two gentlemen, who it seemed had obtruded their advice on him, that he should not take their advice—they were not fathers of the church—they were junior apprentices of the law.

I believe that gentleman will agree with me, that the characters to whom I have alluded, are, and were the fathers of the church; and that their political creed may be embraced in safety; they had passed the degree of entered apprentices, they were "master masons," engaged in building the temple of liberty; at the laying of the chief corner-stone of which, the guardian angel of America inscribed thereon in legible characters, the words, "The People." By the same hand was inscribed over the front door of the temple, the same words, "The People." It has long since been predicted, that if an evil spirit should arise, with power to blot out or obliterate those inscriptions, that fair fabric would fall prostrate to the ground. It has hitherto stood the storms of faction, and the united efforts of corruption and intrigue to sap and undermine it. It is based upon a rock, I trust, more solid and durable than adamant, the affections, the virtue, and intelligence of "the people"—its summit approximates to heaven. My fervent ejaculations are offered to a kind Providence, that it may continue to stand, in its pristine beauty and splendor, "till time shall be no more." We are asked, if it is the duty of a Representative to vote the will of his constituents, where is the power to enforce it—it has no sanction. To which I would answer, just the same power, the same sanction that gentlemen have who contend for the converse of the proposition. Where is the power to compel a member to attend to the faithful and honest discharge of his duties? It depends entirely upon himself in both cases. A member may say, he will vote according to the dictates of his judgment; yet how frequently does it happen, that they are exclusively under the influence of party feelings, of passion and prejudice. Though there is no mode to compel a member to vote the will of his constituents; though there is no sanction; I contend that the right of the people and the duty of the Representative is not thereby impaired. How many of our relative and social duties are without a sanction! the duty we owe as husbands, fathers, neighbors, &c., the most important of any in society; if we fail in the discharge of those duties, where is the legal power to compel us, or inflict punishment for the failure?

I had expected, Mr. Speaker, that those great questions had, by this time, been put to rest. That the Constitutional right of the people to instruct, and the duty of the Representative to obey, have been so frequently recognised and established by the State authorities and by the people, that, at this day, it would not be doubted. I will venture to aver, that, if the archives of the different States were examined, it would be found every one of them had been in the habit of exercising this right, by instructing their Senators; and, in many of them, probably, the right of the people to instruct and the duty of the Representative to obey, expressly recognised, in addition to what is to be found in their constitutions. In the State, sir, which we have the honor of representing in part, I know it is a fact. If this was a question as to the power of the Congress, instead of the right of the people, those "repeated recognitions under varied circumstances," would be considered as having settled it. I beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen to the establishment of a Bank of the United States. It will be recollected that when the United States Bank was established, the then minority, with the present Chief Magistrate at their head, contended, that it was unconstitutional; the bank, however, was established, and went into operation. Previous to the expiration of the charter, a proposition was made to renew it; on the argument of that question, in support of the Constitutional power of Congress, it was contended, that the State Legislatures had impliedly, at least, acknowledged the constitutionality of the measure by providing for the punishment of persons guilty of counterfeiting its notes.

The President, in his objections to the bank bill, which passed both Houses at the last session of the thirteenth Congress, considered the question of the constitutionality as having been settled. He says—"waiving the question of the Constitutional authority of the Legislature to establish an incorporated bank, as being precluded in my judgment by repeated recognitions under varied circumstances of the validity of such an institution, in acts of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications in different modes of a concurrence of the general will of the nation, &c." If we take to ourselves power by implication, (as in the establishment of the bank,) if we refer to legislative and other decisions as well as the concurrence of the general will of the nation, as precluding doubts in relation to it; surely in great questions, involving the rights of the people, the same decisions in their favor, the same concurrent will, ought to be regarded. I wish not to be misunderstood. I have not had reference to the practice of the State Legislatures in instructing their Senators, because I believed such instructions obligatory on the Representative, but for the purpose of showing the constant and uniform opinion of the State authorities; if we err, let us err on the side of the people. Mr. T. concluded, by observing, that he should not go into an examination of the merits of the law of the last session, the subject had long since been exhausted. I shall vote, as I stated at the outset, for its repeal, in doing which, I consider myself as acting in conformity to the wishes of my constituents.

Mr. CONDUCT, of New Jersey, said, that having differed from his colleagues in his vote upon the compensation law of last session, and differing from them now as to the amount of daily pay of the members, he wished to submit a few remarks in explanation of the vote he should give.

I voted for the law of last session, said Mr. C., from a full conviction that, by the depreciation of money, and the increased expense of living in this place, the daily pay of six dollars had virtually become reduced to half its original value. I voted for it, however, very reluctantly, on account of the salary principle, as it was called. I felt also a delicacy in deciding upon our own compensation, and regretted the loss of an amendment offered by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) excluding the present Congress from the operation of the law. Convinced, however, that an increase of compensation was reasonable and just, to enable us to meet increased expenses, I voted for the bill, unpopular as I knew it would be. If the sum to be allowed by this bill be such as I deem a reasonable and fair one, I shall vote for it, and for the repeal of the former law.

The question now before us is, shall the daily pay of members remain as formerly, at six dollars, or be increased? Or, to state it more conformably to facts as they actually exist, the question will stand thus: Shall the daily pay, reduced by circumstances to half its original value, be restored to something near its former amount?

I will not trespass on the patience of the House, by repeating the arguments in favor of an increase. They are fully and ably stated in the report of the committee, and have been submitted to the press. Indeed, the necessity and propriety of an increase of wages had been so felt by every member of both Houses, long before the bill of last session was thought of, as to be the daily topic of conversation at the fireside, and in every circle. On this subject I never heard but one opinion expressed from any quarter of the House, and nothing but the state of the Treasury, and the calls for taxes, prevented the measure from being brought forward at an earlier day. The opposition to the bill last year, I always understood, was to the manner, more than to the amount. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGER) is the only exception within my knowledge, and his ample fortune, as he candidly told us, rendered any compensation a matter of indifference to him. Much light has been shed, however, on this subject since the last session, especially at the elections, and many gentlemen who contented themselves with profound silence have since discovered many very weighty objections, even to an increase of the old six dollars.

The first and principal objection is, that it is unpopular. This is true to a certain extent, and would have been true to nearly the same extent if the original compensation had been two dollars; or, indeed, if the practice had been to have no compensation at all. Any increase of wages by any legislative body will be, to a certain extent, unpopular, and therefore the mere popularity hunter will say no to the measure, although he may extend his charity so far as to look complacently on those who differ from him, and force a few dollars into his pocket. I admit that many honest citizens, from the best of motives, have disapproved an increase of pay. The man who labors for two dollars cannot see the propriety of paying to others six dollars; and it is useless to reason the case with him. The great mass of the people know nothing of the expenses which are unavoidable at the Seat of Government, and if you tell them of fourteen or sixteen dollars per week for room rent and board, they will say you must be very extravagant. They think nothing, or very lightly, of the derangement of private business, and losses at home, produced by an absence of six months. It is, therefore, not to be expected that, whilst the great proportion of the people look upon the subject in this manner, they will applaud an increase of the daily pay. And when we consider how many factious and intriguing demagogues are found, anxious to destroy the reputation of others, that they may build their own upon the ruins, laboring by misrepresentations and false statements to effect their dirty purposes, and withdraw public confidence when it has been bestowed, it is no wonder that there has been much clamor excited against the law of last session. But gentlemen have fallen into an error in supposing that all the clamor connected with the compensation law, so called, is proof of its unpopularity. Let us for a moment examine it. This clamor, if it be considered as proof that the law is unpopular, should have been directed exclusively against the friends of the law. Look at your elections. They will teach you, that those who voted against it have fared no better than those who voted for it. The people have said in vulgar language, "the receiver is as bad as the thief." In many places public censure has been most pointed against those who voted negatively, and received the money. As far as the result of the election is known, I believe more members are returned to the next Congress who were in favor of the law, than of those who were against it. The original mover, (Mr. JOHNSON,) his colleague, (the SPEAKER,) and a member from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) the leading and able advocates of the bill, are all of them re-elected to the next Congress. Many of the New England members who voted for it, as well as from New York, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere, are also returned. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER,) who so signally distinguished himself as the champion of opposition, remains at home. All the Georgia delegation, though voting against it also, are left out of the next Congress, except one gentleman, and he decidedly in favor of increasing the wages. I admit the law is unpopular, and many have lost their seats because they voted for it. But much of the clamor has been artificially excited by designing men, and, to create the greater vacancy, it has been indiscriminately pointed at on all sides. It has been a two-edged sword, aimed at the throats of both friends and foes. In New Jersey it has been wielded with great dexterity, as a sort of triangular weapon. I have been dismissed for voting for the bill; one of my colleagues for voting against it, and another one for not voting at all on either side.

The tranquillity of the public mind at that season was highly favorable for the views of the demagogues of faction and noise. An universal calm pervaded every section. Party animosity had subsided. Political distinctions had nearly ceased. The Federal copartnership was dissolved. The Hartford Convention had dispersed. Bonaparte in St. Helena. Noembargo. Nowar. Newspaper editors were in danger of starvation, and, for want of other prey, they pounced upon the compensation law, and, like Peter's brown loaf, it has served them for beef and mutton, custard, and plumb-pudding. It was a standing dish for months, and was served up in every possible shape, boiled and roasted, stewed and fricaseed. Devoured by the demagogues of faction, it has been reissued from their pestiferous jaws at the tipping houses and dram shops, highly seasoned with falsehood and misrepresentation. And this is called "public sentiment," and "public opinion." This is "instruction from our constituents," which the Representative is bound to obey. What a spectacle shall we exhibit to the world! Selected by the nation to discharge the high and important functions of legislators, we are looking to the crossroads and the alehouse for instructions, to guide our deliberations and to govern our votes. We are looking and waiting with eager anxiety to know what is popular, and how we shall best secure our re-election.

Far be it from me, however to disregard public opinion, when deliberately expressed and fairly understood. So far as it is the voice of reason and of justice it should be obeyed; and there is no danger that it will not at all times receive its full share of attention. But there is much danger that momentary excitement, from false colorings, may mislead public opinion, and give it a wrong direction. There is an important distinction between that opinion which follows a cool, dispassionate inquiry into public measures, and that noisy clamor which precedes inquiry, which stifles investigation. The one is the legitimate offspring of reason, the other a monster, begotten by fiends and furies, and nurtured by slander and falsehood. The hunters of popularity will have more prudence and foresight than to oppose its course. They will not breast the torrent; it is easier to float down with the scum.

I prize the approbation of my neighbors and friends, as highly as any man. Next to an approving conscience, it is the highest reward which the Representative can receive at the hands of his constituents; but I cannot consent to purchase it at the expense of my own convictions of right and wrong. My constituents delegated me to exercise my best judgment, fairly and honestly, on all questions of legislation which should be brought before me. I should forfeit their confidence, I should betray my trust, I should merit their execration, if, as their Representative, I could assent to any measure which, in my best judgment, is prejudicial to their best interests. My judgment may err, but it is my duty to follow its dictates, aided by the best lights which I can obtain. The enlightened portion of the community will ultimately draw a proper distinction between the independent Representative who dares to think for himself, and who does his duty, and the mere temporizing politician, who prostitutes the dignified station of a Representative, to secure his popularity and his re-election.

My constituents have placed in my hands a book of instructions as the guide of my political conduct, and have exacted of me an oath to obey its directions. That book is the Constitution of our country, the fruit of the Revolutionary war, drawn up by our fathers with much labor, and sealed with their blood. With the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) to that book I look for my instructions, and I find them written so plainly, they cannot be mistaken. What are the great objects and duties therein pointed out? They are inscribed on its front—"to form a more perfect union—to establish justice—insure domestic tranquillity—provide for the common defence—promote the general welfare—and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Until these instructions shall be revoked, they will form the code of every independent, faithful statesman. He will cling to them steadfastly in the hour of frenzy and delusion. And that is the hour of danger for the Republic. That is the time which tests principles and tries firmness.

A second objection against an increase of compensation is, that the time is unfavorable—the taxes are heavy—the nation is in debt. These are certainly plausible objections—well calculated to catch and tickle the public ear. Let us see how much weight they possess.

Were any additional taxes imposed last year, in consequence of the compensation law? Were not the taxes diminished one-half their amount? And will they not be still more diminished at the present session? Will any one solitary item of taxation, direct or indirect, be less reduced by this proposed measure? Not one—nor does any one pretend to entertain such an idea. Neither will the payment of the public debt be postponed one month or one day.

As to the time, whether it be unfavorable or not, it was at least unwelcome. It was perhaps an evil hour. It was an hour which I would never have hurried on. For myself, individually, I would sooner have sacrificed one-half of my scanty property, than have proposed the measure. It needed no prophet to predict the consequences. A slight knowledge of human nature, and of the character of a popular government, would foresee the arts and tricks which have been so dexterously played off, to mislead public opinion, and vilify public characters. Any increase of wages, no matter how trifling, to members of this body, will never fail to convulse the country for a time, so long as human nature retains its propensities. The greatest political calamity which an envious declaimer need wish to fall upon a statesman, is, to see him placed under the necessity of voting upon such a measure. No matter on which side of the question he votes, yea or nay, it is all one. If he vote aye, he is a greedy devourer of the public money, a public plunderer. If he vote nay, or if he shuns a vote, he is a time-server, a seeker of popularity, and unworthy of public confidence. If he receive the money, the partaker is as bad as the thief, and if he refuse it, he is courting popular applause, and seeking a future opportunity of plunging deeper into the public chest.

No sir; I would not have brought forward this proposition at this time. I would rather have borne "the ills we have, than flee to others that we know not of." Nor would the honorable mover (Mr. JOHNSON) have brought it forward from any other consideration, than a perfect conviction of the necessity and justice of the measure, after many years of experience and of pecuniary sacrifice in the public service. That same devotion to his country, which prompted him to face the savage, and to brave the battle's fury on the Thames, prompted him in this hall to lead the forlorn hope, to assume a responsibility, from which any other man would have shrunk.

But although I would not at the time have proposed the measure, neither could I avoid deciding upon it when presented before me, according to what I deemed the true interests of my country. Whatever may be the delicacy of the question—however it may subject me to popular odium, I shall endeavor to discharge my duty, and leave the event to the great disposer of all things.

The bill, purporting a repeal of the salary principle, and fixing a daily compensation, so far meets my approbation. Not being a member of the next Congress, I feel none of the embarrassment I formerly experienced, in voting on a question affecting my own compensation. If the blank be filled with such a sum as may enable gentlemen, in future, to defray expenses here, and furnish a reasonable support to their families in their absence; if, in short, the compensation be such, that a man in moderate circumstances, if elected, may hold a seat without entire ruin to his family—I will vote for the bill. Neither the times, nor the interests of the country, require such individual sacrifices. I know instances of a long life, faithfully devoted to public service, and with a careful economy here and at home, terminating in poverty, not in absolute want of bread, but of comparative poverty. It is not enough that they have surrendered their domestic comforts and enjoyments, undergone the pains and privations of sickness from home; the unavoidable demands every year upon their private means for support have reduced them to scanty allowance. I hope for better times for those who are to succeed us. I shall vote for eight dollars, as a medium, calculated to meet the cases of a great majority of such as I wish to see occupying seats here. I mean, men in the middle walks of life. With prudent management, it will afford them a decent support, and no more. To the wealthy it can be no object, and although it may possibly tempt the man who has no employment at home, or whose time is of no value to him, yet the good sense of the people will, in most instances, teach them, that such men are as great drones here as they are at home.

I consider it the duty of the present Congress to fix the daily pay, in such manner as may put the question to rest for years. Since it has been agitated, I wish the country may derive some benefit from the discussion, by settling it upon principles of reason and justice. Clamor has partly subsided, and malice has spent its rage—timid gentlemen may dismiss their fears. They will not expose their popularity to great hazard, by voting for eight dollars. The sober, reflecting part of the community, who think much though they talk but little, will most of them believe it a reasonable increase. They have witnessed for many years the same principle operating throughout every class of society. They have seen the necessities of life constantly advancing in price, and every mechanic and artisan compelled to follow in the train. Reason will gradually correct the errors of the past day, and expose the false colorings of the slanderer. I trust, confidently, we shall unite to increase the compensation in future, so as to do justice to our successors, and to our country. I am confirmed in this hope, by the result of the vote of yesterday, on striking out six. Those gentlemen who had manifested, in Committee, so strong a partiality for six dollars, did not seem greatly disquieted by the decision to strike out that sum. They sustained the disappointment with becoming fortitude. And should they be compelled to take eight dollars for the sake of obeying the law, I trust they will extend their charitable forbearance to the majority, for obliging them to perform so disagreeable a duty, without any deduction from their popularity.

Mr. W. P. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania, said, as he had heretofore voted for filling the blank with six dollars, and should now vote to fill it with eight, he wished to assign his reasons for so doing, which he should do in as few words as possible. I shall vote, sir, said Mr. M., to fill the blank with eight dollars, because I begin to find that if the blank is not filled with that sum, the whole bill will be lost; the consequence of which may be that the law of the last session will remain un repealed.

When we consider, sir, that the House have already rejected six dollars, ten dollars, and nine dollars, and that many members have avowed their determination to vote against the bill in toto, if the blank is not filled with eight dollars, I think there is every reason to conclude that we have arrived at a point from which we must take our choice either to fill the blank with eight dollars, or lose the whole bill.

Perhaps, sir, said Mr. M., I may be mistaken in the disposition of the House; but, from the best judgment I can form, it appears to me that the proper course to be pursued at this time, is to vote for filling the blank with eight dollars.

Mr. HOPKINSON observed, that whatever might be the result in which this discussion should end, he rejoiced the House had not obeyed the impulses of some of the members, and entered upon it on the first meeting of Congress; before indeed we were fairly seated in our places. It would have been so much like being driven to action by a panic; so much like legislating with the enemy at the gate; so much like capitulating to a mob, that it must have sunk the House very low in the estimation of that people we are so solicitous to please and propitiate. The character and dignity of the National Legislature required a very different sort of proceeding; and Mr. H. was happy that the appearance, at least, of calmness and deliberation had been afforded to whatever decision might ultimately prevail. On what is called the compensation law, Mr. H. did not mean to say a word; for as it seemed to be resolved, much against his judgment, to repeal the law of the last session, and the question now was a mere question of dollars and cents—a question whether a blank should be filled with 6, 7, or 8, dollars—it was so wholly indifferent to him how it was filled, that on such a subject he would not have asked the attention of the House for a moment. But a question of more value and importance had arisen, somewhat incidentally, in the debate. I mean, whether, in a representative republican Government, a Representative in the National Council is bound to obey the instructions of his constituents on any proposed measure? This, in truth, has become the main question; for so many members have avowed that their own private judgment opposes the repeal of the law, and yet they will vote for the repeal, because they think the voice of their constituents demands it, and they believe themselves bound to obey that voice; that to convince them they are bound by no such obligation, and restore them the exercise of their own will and judgment, is to prevent the repeal of the law in question. Mr. H. said he would distinctly state the question before he offered his remarks upon it. It is this: whether, in a Government like ours, a Representative is bound absolutely to obey the instructions of those who elected him, on any proposed measure? Mr. H. had no idea of entering upon the broad and general ground which this inquiry opens; not only on account of the lateness of the hour, but also because it was familiar to every man who had given any attention to political disquisitions. Mr. H.'s intention was to reply to some of the arguments advanced in the course of this debate; particularly by an honorable gentleman from Virginia. But his main object was to show, and he thought it might be unanswerably demonstrated, that in principle and in practice, there is no difference, not the least, on this subject, between those gentlemen who profess such profound reverence to, such implicit obedience for the people, and their voice, however uttered, and those gentlemen who claim the right of thinking, and judging, and acting for themselves, although they may not always, in so doing, chime in harmony with the popular tone. I wish, then, that these gentlemen may go fairly together before the people, with no claims of superiority, in this respect, on either side. I will not say or imagine that the honorable gentlemen who so stoutly maintain the popular ground, mean to deceive the people by professions which seem to offer up everything to the will of the people; to submit themselves, in the language of one gentleman, bound hand and foot, to the disposal of their constituents; while the limitations they put to their obedience, destroy all its efficacy. No, sir, these gentlemen deceive themselves; and, in an effort to maintain an untenable position, overthrow themselves.

The question is, have the constituents of a Representative a right to bind him by their instructions? Now, sir, the very nature of a right, if it be a perfect right, and such must be the right of a sovereign, whether that sovereign be the people or an individual, the very nature of such a right, is, that it is absolute, uncontrollable, and morally irresistible. If the person on whom this right is to be exercised, has a paramount right to judge, in any case, whether he will be bound by it or not, it is no longer a right. It is utterly absurd and incongruous to say I have a right to command a person who may lawfully choose, in any case, whether he will obey me or not. A right of this sort must be everything or nothing; it must govern and be obeyed by its own fiat, or it is not absolute. If it submits itself to the discretion of the person commanded to decide in what cases it shall be obeyed, it has no force of its own; it is powerless; it is nugatory. Now, sir, has any honorable gentleman agreed to submit himself, his judgment and conscience, to the will of the people, without limitation or exception?

One gentleman, not at all reserved in professions of obedience, has retained to himself the right of judging for himself, on all Constitutional questions; on all questions of great national consequence, where he thinks his opportunities of judging are better than those of the people; and in all cases where he might be required to commit some moral turpitude. Now, sir, a moment need not be spent to show that these exceptions utterly destroy the rule, and leave the conduct and judgment of the gentlemen as large as the wind; leave them just as they ought to be. The honorable gentleman from Virginia, who has gone beyond everybody else in asserting this right of the people, and supported it by the least argument—for as you raise the doctrine, you must leave the argument—still feels the necessity of reserving something for his own conscience, and putting some limitation to this overbearing power. He will obey the people in every case, except when they should command him to violate the Constitution, and he imagines he clears himself of all difficulty, when, with an air of triumph, he declares the reason of this exception to be, that, inasmuch as the people have no right to violate the Constitution themselves, they have no right to command him to do it. Let us look a little into this reason, and see what it amounts to. In the first place, I would ask the honorable gentleman why this absolute, sovereign, uncontrollable power, may not violate the Constitution, and also command him to do it? To use his own language, is not the creature, in this case, greater than the creator? May not the power that builds destroy, and take his hands, if it shall so will, to do the work of destruction? But the people have bound themselves, or agreed to be bound by the Constitution; and have further agreed, that it shall be changed only in a prescribed mode. And pray, sir, have they not also agreed in the same compact or Constitution, that laws shall be made and repealed in a certain prescribed mode; that is, by their Representatives, and not by themselves, and that if made in this manner they will obey them until they shall be repealed in the same manner? The principle then on which that gentleman would give an independent vote, on a Constitutional question, equally binds him to do so in the making or repealing of a law. But the honorable gentleman's difficulties do not end here. He will obey his constituents, implicitly, unless when they command him to violate the Constitution; he will submit his will and judgment to theirs in every other case. Who then is to judge whether the measure in question does or does not violate the Constitution? If he takes this to himself, he judges over the people; if he gives it to them, he surrenders his exception. I will not take the case of a plain, direct violation of the Constitution in terms—such as a proposition to lay a duty on exports—but take a questionable case. For instance, the Bank. The gentleman shall think the establishment of a National Bank a clear breach of the Constitution; his constituents think otherwise, and order him to vote for one. What will he do? Will he oppose his opinion on a Constitutional point to that of the people, any more than on the policy of a law, or any other question. I cannot break the Constitution, says the gentleman. We do not ask you to do it, say his constituents; and then he puts himself at a direct issue with them, and must either give up his judgment and conscience, on a Constitutional question, or resist the right of the people to direct and control his judgment. To such embarrassing dilemmas will doctrines always lead, which are unsound and untenable; which are for the ear, and not for the understanding. Where then is the difference between the gentlemen whose professions seem to differ so much? All agree, that the people may instruct, if you will give them the right of judging when they shall obey. The people shall be the king; but I will be viceroy over the king, is the amount of every opinion on this subject. Some gentlemen, it is true, prescribe to themselves very limited exceptions, while others throw the whole field open. But it is obvious, that the right to make any exception, at the will and discretion of the Representative, is the right to make every exception. Gentlemen have, therefore, rather been declaring in what cases they would, or would not, choose to obey the people, than asserting the right of the people to insist on their obedience in every case.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia has Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

insisted, with considerable vehemence, that the very name we bear imports an obligation to obey the will of the people. What is a Representative, but a person acting for another, and of course bound to act as his constituent shall direct? I confess I did not expect to hear, in a grave assembly like this, a principle deduced from a name; an immutable truth from an arbitrary term. On this reasoning, then, we are to understand, that a Senator, not being called a Representative, is not bound by instructions; at least, not by virtue of this argument. And yet I believe the right to instruct a Senator has been carried, or asserted, to a greater extent than in relation to members of this House. State Legislatures take upon them to instruct Senators, while they but request the Representatives to attend to them.

Again; the gentleman from Virginia demands, in the tone of a decided triumph, shall one man, shall a single individual, oppose himself to the will and power of thirty-five thousand? the issue of such a contest, says the gentleman, cannot be long doubtful. In the first place, I would remark, that the gentleman has fallen into an error in his calculation on this subject. The opposition, in this case, is not of one to thirty-five thousand. It is true, every member here represents that number of persons, composed of men, women and children; but as I have never understood the women and children are consulted, or give any opinion on these occasions, when instructions are given to members of Congress, they should not form a part of the gentleman's force or his argument. But, sir, it is really of no consequence whether it is thirty-five thousand, or thirty-five millions, or thirty-five individuals—the principle is the same. If it is understood that any gentleman on this floor opposes himself, personally, individually, by his own mere force and authority, to the will and power of either of the numbers named, he would indeed be guilty of all the absurdity and folly imputed to him; and such a contest would be neither doubtful nor long. But, sir, when I oppose myself to what is called the will of the people, I do it by virtue of the authority of the people, I oppose them with their own power; I stand against them on their own authority. To their will, or their passions, expressed at a tumultuous meeting, on a subject perhaps misrepresented or misunderstood, I oppose their paramount will, expressed in the Constitution, solemnly and deliberately declared and affirmed by the experience and practice of years. In that Constitution, I find that the people have declared, that Congress, and that I, as a part of that body, shall have the power to legislate for them, and not they for themselves; that I may, for them, borrow money, regulate commerce, &c. &c., and that they will be bound by my judgment on these subjects, and not I by theirs; that they will be bound by what I shall do in these respects, and not that I shall be bound by what they may wish; I mean, sir, absolutely and strictly bound, hand and foot, as the gentleman from Virginia has declared. Sir, I consider this doctrine to be absolutely destructive of the very principles and uses of republican representative Government, as distinguished from a mere democracy. The advantage consists not only in the greater convenience with which the public business may be done; but in the deliberation, the calmness, the foresight, the knowledge, the experience, with which it is considered, discussed, and decided; unshaken by the passions which agitate a popular meeting, unawed by the violence, unmoved by the prejudices; with full time to acquire all the necessary information on the subject under consideration. The public affairs are more safe here than they could be in large, unsteady, uninformed, and tumultuous assemblies of the people. But all these advantages will be lost, if the people are, by the machinery of instructions, to infuse all their passions into this body, and to blow the blast of violence through their Representatives, which they are not permitted to do in person. I consider myself, then, standing on this floor as the attorney of the people, irrevocable for two years, and during that period invested, independent of them, with all the Constitutional powers belonging to a Representative of the people. I am independent of them, not by my own power, not in my own right, but because in their power and wisdom, for their own purposes, they have willed, that I shall be so. They can neither shorten the duration of the trust, nor limit the extent of its powers. They cannot, during the period for which they have elected me, by any meeting or resolutions, reach the power they have given me; they cannot declare I am not, for that term, their Representative here; nor can they, for the same reason, diminish or take back to themselves any part of my power while I am here. If these doctrines are now well established by the wisest and soundest politicians in England, are they not still more obvious and necessary in a Government like ours? We are not an entire people, under one entire Government; but a number of confederated States, united for the common good, under one Government, for certain purposes, to a certain extent, and on certain terms distinctly set forth, in the great national compact called the Constitution. It is, assuredly, one of the terms of this Confederation, that the laws which are to govern the whole, shall be made, not by the people themselves, influenced by local interests and prejudices, and having but little knowledge or care of the interests of distant members of the Empire; but by agents, representatives deputed by the several parts, with full powers to consult and act together, for the common welfare. This sort of union and consultation will produce a consistency and harmony of public measures which could never be attained if each part were to deliberate and decide at home, and convey the result to a common centre. By meetings in general council, the interest of the whole are brought into one view; compromises of differences take place; the member from one section of the Union convinces those from another that it is right to yield certain points of local advantage; and, in turn, he gives up something on his part. Could any of this great work, without which we should soon fall into confusion and disunion, be done if the parts were to act separately? And where is the difference between their acting thus separately, and their doing so by means of instructions to their Representatives, which they dare not disobey? On this system this House could never agree upon anything. Further, sir, it would place the people in different parts of the Union on an unequal and unfair footing; giving those who are near to the Seat of Government the opportunity and the advantage, if it be one, of constantly interfering in and directing the public measures, while the more distant one cannot be heard. The latter have their influence in the public councils by their Representatives only; while the former may add all their own weight to that of the Representatives. The Representatives, too, stand on an unequal ground; some being backed and instructed by their constituents; and others acting solely on their own responsibility and judgment. A measure is carried through before a citizen of Louisiana can hear of it; while the people in the vicinity of Congress have been pressing their whole weight on the judgment or fears of that body. Is this the bargain, sir, between the different members of the Confederation? Is this a fair execution of the national compact? I think not. The States have agreed with each other that the common business shall be done by their appointed Delegates in Congress assembled, on due consultation and deliberation; and so it is not done if we are permitted neither to consult nor deliberate, but are bound to vote and to act as instructed and directed. On personal grounds, I will only ask gentlemen to reflect what will be their situation, if, in obedience to instructions, they give a vote against their judgment and conscience, and which they already see will be productive of evil, perhaps ruinous consequences to their country. When those consequences shall fall upon us, they will in vain go to look for justification and consolation in and from that public voice they had so rashly obeyed. Where will they find it? Gone, vanished, nobody owns it; or more likely, they will find it cursing them for their servility and obedience. But let them consult and obey the voice within, the dictates of their own conscience, and they will always know where to find their consolation and justification.

The question was now taken on filling the blank with eight dollars, and decided in the negative, as follows:

Mr. GROSVENOR then moved to strike out the whole of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert as follows:

"That, from and after the close of the present session of Congress, the act entitled, 'An act to change the mode of compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and delegates from Territories,' and all other acts and parts of acts relating to the pay or compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and of the delegates of the several Territories, for their services, be and the same are hereby repealed."

Mr. HARRISON then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to fill the blanks in the same with the word "six."

Mr. HARRISON said, that after the avowal he had made, that his object in moving to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions as to filling the blank, was intended to put an end to what he considered an unprofitable discussion, it might appear strange that he should rise himself to make any observations on the general question. But as he was placed, with regard to the vote he intended to give, in a situation which might bring upon him the charge of inconsistency, he would claim the attention of the House for a single minute, whilst he explained the motives which would govern him. I am one of those, said Mr. H., who think that six dollars per diem is not an adequate compensation for members of the National Legislature. I entirely agree with gentlemen who have taken that ground, and with the statement made by the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, as to the decreased value of money compared with the products of agriculture, since the compensation was fixed at six dollars. I am also, said Mr. H., decidedly of opinion, that, in a Republican Government, the compensation of those who are in the public service should be liberal. A contrary course will fill the Legislature exclusively with men of wealth, or with those who have no talents, or other qualifications for the important duties of legislation; who come here the mere muckworms of popularity, as the honorable gentleman from Virginia has termed them, whilst the man of talents, without fortune, will elsewhere seek employment. With these convictions strongly fixed in my mind, I have voted throughout for the re-establishment of the old per diem allowance. My reason for doing so is a very short one. I was governed by motives of respect to the wishes and opinions of the American people, whose voice upon this, as upon every other subject, when it can be fairly and distinctly ascertained, I deem myself bound to obey.

Amendment to the Constitution.

What, say gentlemen, give up your own opinions to a mob? Become a mere machine, to be moved as the caprices of the people may direct? No, said Mr. H., my opinions I will never surrender, but upon conviction of their being erroneous; but upon this floor I stand as the Representative, or the agent, of my constituents; bound, I think, by every moral obligation to execute their will. But had I a different opinion, with regard to the right of instruction, yet upon this particular subject, if on no other, I should conform to the wishes of the people in opposition to my own opinion. In fixing their compensation, the members of Congress act as judges in their own cause. This consideration should, I think, determine them to take that dignified stand, to be contented with what the people are willing to allow them, or resign their seats. The subject of increasing the compensation had never been before the public until the law of the last session was passed. The irritation it occasioned was produced not so much by the amount as the mode of compensation, and its retrospective operation. The law is, however, entirely unpopular; the people are determined upon its repeal, and they must, they will be gratified. Obey their voice, then; restore the compensation to its original standard; suffer the indignation which has been excited against the present law to cool, and I am persuaded that the justice, the generosity of the people will be manifest by suffering a future Congress to put their per diem allowance upon a liberal footing.

Mr. FORSYTH suggested, as a readier and preferable mode than going through all the forms of the House again, the propriety of repealing at once the present and reviving the former act, which would produce the result contemplated by Mr. HARRISON; and expressed the regret and humiliation he felt that the subject should have occupied so much time as it had already; and his dislike to commence it anew.

Before the question was taken on Mr. HARRISON's motion, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 21.

Mr. BLOUNT presented sundry resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry inhabitants of Blount county, in the State of Tennessee, respecting the situation of land titles in that county, the grievances of the people in consequence of the conflicting claims arising under the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, and soliciting that so much of the act of 1806, as fixes a specific price for the public lands within the said State of Tennessee, and as appropriate certain described parts of the same for the benefit of seminaries of learning, may be repealed.—Referred to the select committee appointed yesterday on the memorial of the Legislature of North Carolina, concerning the said lands.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of the inhabitants of the Territory of Michigan, reported a bill allowing further time for entering certain donation rights to land in the district of Detroit; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House, on the bill making provision for the location of the lands reserved by the first article of the treaty between the United States and the Creek Indians, to certain chiefs and warriors of that nation.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his report in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 17th of April last, directing him to procure, and lay before the House, information in relation to the lead mines of the United States, lying in the counties of Washington and St. Genevieve, and Territory of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled an act authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Joseph Stewart and others," was read a third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a "Joint Resolution to employ John Trumbull to compose and execute certain paintings," in which resolution they desire the concurrence of this House.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. PICKENS, one of the Representatives from the State of North Carolina, laid before the House the following proceedings of the Legislature of that State; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table:

State of North Carolina:

The Committee to whom was referred a resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, report:

That the said resolution is in principle the same with that adopted by the General Assembly of North Carolina at their last session, with a modification of one of its provisions in the said resolutions; which meets the unanimous concurrence of your committee. They therefore recommend that the resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in the words following, to wit: "That for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall by its Legislature be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives to which each State may be entitled. The districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain as nearly as may be an equal number of inhabitants, entitled by the Constitution to be represented. In each district the qualified voters shall elect one Representative and no more. That for the purpose of appointing Electors of President of the United States, each State shall by its Legislature be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of Electors to which such State may be entitled. The districts shall be composed of contiguous territory, and contain as nearly as may be an equal number of inhabitants entitled by the Constitution to representation. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives, shall appoint one Elector and no more. The Electors when convened shall have power, in case any of them appointed as above prescribed shall fail to attend for the purposes of their said appointment on the day prescribed for giving their votes for President and Vice President of the United States, to appoint another or others to act in the place of him or them so failing to attend. Neither the districts for choosing Representatives, nor those for appointing Electors, shall be altered in any State until a census and apportionment of Representatives under it subsequent to the division of the State into districts shall be made. The division of States into districts, hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted and ratified as a part of the Constitution of the United States; and successively immediately afterwards whenever a census and apportionment of Representatives under it shall be made. The division of each State into districts, for the purposes both of choosing Representatives and of appointing Electors, shall be altered agreeably to the provisions of this amendment, and on no other occasion"—be adopted. And that our Senators in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to endeavor to obtain the said amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved further, That his Excellency the Governor of this State be, and he is hereby, requested to forward a copy of the preceding resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and also to the Executives of the several States, accompanied with a request that the same may be laid before their respective Legislatures for their consideration and adoption. COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to prohibit all commercial intercourse with ports and places, into or with which the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the navigation of the United States.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill to prohibit all commercial intercourse with ports or places into, or with which, the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, no ship or vessel belonging to, or coming, directly or indirectly, from any port or place, into, or with which, the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, shall be permitted to enter the harbors or waters of the United States, or the Territories thereof; vessels employed by any Government for the sole purpose of carrying letters or despatches, and also vessels forced in by distress, and by the dangers of the sea, only excepted. And if any ship or vessel belonging to, or coming directly or indirectly from, any port or place, into, or with which, the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, not excepted as aforesaid, shall, after the said thirtieth day of June next, arrive within the limits of the United States, or Territories thereof, contrary to the provisions of this act, such ship or vessel, together with the cargo, if any, which may be found on board, shall be forfeited, and may be seized and condemned in any court of the United States, or the Territories thereof, having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, no foreign ship or vessel shall be permitted to clear out or depart from the United States, or the Territories thereof, to any port or place, into, or with which, the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade; and, from and after the said thirtieth day of June, next, no foreign ship or vessel shall be permitted to clear out or depart from the United States, or the Territories thereof, until the owner, consignee, master or commander, shall have given bond, with sufficient sureties, being citizens of the United States, in double the value of the vessel, and double the value of the cargo, if any, that such ship or vessel shall proceed directly to, and land her cargo, if any, at some port or place of the nation to which such ship or vessel may belong, and into, or with which, the vessels of the United States are ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, and shall not proceed to, or trade with, any port or place, into, or with which, the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade; and any bond taken, as aforesaid, shall be cancelled by the collector taking the same, on the production to him, within one year from the date of such bond, of the certificate of the Consul of the United States, residing at the port where the vessel may arrive, and the cargo, if any, be landed; or, if there be no Consul of the United States there, then the certificate of two respectable merchants, under oath, residing there: (Provided, It shall appear to the collector, from the facts proved by such certificate, that the condition of the bond has been complied with;) and if such certificate be not produced, as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the proper officer to proceed to the recovery and collection of the amount of said bond, in any court having competent jurisdiction: Provided, nevertheless, That the obligors may discharge themselves from liability for the payment thereof, prior to final judgment against them, by the production of the certificate required by this act, and by the payment of the costs of suit which may have accrued previous to the production of the certificate aforesaid.

Accountability of Disbursing Officers.

H. OF R.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any foreign ship or vessel shall, after the thirtieth day of June next, depart or attempt to depart from any port of the United States without a clearance, or without having given bond as required by this act, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, shall be wholly forfeited, and may be seized and condemned, in any court of the United States, or the Territories thereof, having competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, to prescribe rules and regulations for the government of the Consuls of the United States, in foreign ports or places, in granting the certificate required by the second section of this act, and to the collector, the nature and form of the evidence which shall be required in those ports or places, into, and with which, vessels of the United States are ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, wherein no Consul of the United States may reside at the time of the arrival of the vessel and landing the cargo, as required in the second section of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures arising under, or incurred by virtue of this act, the prosecution for, and collection of, which are not herein otherwise provided for, may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, with costs of suit, by action of debt, in the name of the United States of America, or by indictment on information, in any court having competent jurisdiction to try the same; and shall be distributed and accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine; and such penalties and forfeitures may be examined, mitigated, or remitted, in like manner, and under the like conditions, regulations and restrictions, as are prescribed, authorized and directed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," passed the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and made perpetual by an act passed the eleventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred.

DISBURSING OFFICERS.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House letters addressed to him as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Acting Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, respecting the accountability of public officers and agents, and the duties and emoluments of the Attorney General; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The letters are as follow :

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 31, 1816.

SIR: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, requesting information on the following subjects, viz:

1. Is it intended to apply the power of imprisonment and sale of property, proposed in a late report to the Senate from the Secretaries of the Departments, to cases of property, as well as money, which may be withheld from the Government by its officers?

2. Is it proposed to allow any judicial examination into the claim of the United States, either when an officer who has received money from the Government claims credits not admitted in his accounts, or where a citizen is charged by a Department as a depository of public money which he denies having received?

3. Would the accountability of public officers be sufficiently secured if the different proposals contained in the report above referred to were all to be adopted, with the exception of that for the establishment of a new Department?

In answer to the first inquiry, it is proper to observe that the reasons for resorting to the arrest and imprisonment of the defaulting officer where property is embezzled or withheld are equally strong as in the case of money. It is presumed that imprisonment would be resorted to only where there is a deficiency of property to satisfy the demand, or in the case of a refusal to settle accounts when adjustments of the accounts of others are dependent upon such settlement. In both these cases, but particularly in the latter, the most rigid exercise of the powers vested in the Government would be indispensable.

A judicial examination, where the officer should allege that injustice had been done in the settlement of his accounts, would perpetuate the delays in the settlement of the public accounts which have produced the derangement in the accounting offices that are intended to be remedied by the summary procedure recommended by the report. It is highly improbable that injustice will be practised by the auditing officers; but if it should happen in any case, the appeal should be to Congress, who will always grant relief.

It is not intended to apply the summary procedure proposed in the report to the Senate to any other persons than officers of the Government. If the Government confide the public property to other persons than officers, their rights as individuals ought not to be affected. It is not proposed to extend the principle beyond the necessity which has produced its application to a certain description of officers. Justice and consistency require that it should apply to the disbursing as well as to the collecting officers of the Government.

In answering the third inquiry, serious difficulties present themselves. The Indian Department stands in front. It is possible that, by a more specific regulation in that branch of the public service than has heretofore been attempted, its accounts might be reduced to some general principles which would admit of their settlement by an Auditor without the sanction of the Head of the Department. Measures have been taken during the present year with a view to such a regulation. Should this be effected, the most serious obstacle to the settlement of those accounts would be removed.

In recommending the establishment of another independent Department, the Secretaries were influenced in some degree by the consideration that the public interest required that the Executive Department should be simple and uniform in its organization. The various branches of Executive authority are now under the direction of the Secretaries of the Departments, except the General Post Office and the Mint. They form exceptions to the general principle upon which the Executive Department has been organized. The best examination which the Secretaries have been able to give the subject has led to the belief that the anomalous organization of these Departments has not been productive of any beneficial consequences. The General Post Office, independent of the anomaly just stated, presents another of a more singular character. The revenue accruing from the postage of letters is disbursed directly by the General Post Office. No part of it comes into the public Treasury except that portion of it which exceeds the expenses of the Department. The immense sums which are paid to contractors for the transportation of the mail, and to all the postmasters throughout the nation, are disbursed directly by the Postmaster General. The accounts of the Department are revised by the accounting officers of the Treasury, but they are now about six years in arrear.

It is not contended that the establishment of a new Department is indispensably necessary to change the organization of the General Post Office, so as to subject the payment of money in that Department to the checks to which all other payments of public money are subjected. The sums arising from postage of letters might be paid directly into the Treasury, and all sums due to contractors might be paid by warrants at the Treasury, as well without the establishment of a new Department as with it. If it were deemed necessary, all postmasters whose emoluments exceeded a given sum might be paid in the same manner; or the postmasters of all distributing offices might be placed upon that footing. This discrimination might lead to the suggestion that it would be proper to subject that class of officers to the ordeal of passing through the Senate. This suggestion, however, is foreign to the subject of your inquiry. The changes suggested in the modes of conducting the fiscal concerns of the General Post Office were necessarily involved in the proposition to make a new Department, to which it should be subordinate.

We think proper to add that, although provision may be made for the settlement of all the public accounts without the institution of a new Department, we have no doubt that the just principles of accountability would be better preserved, and economy promoted, by the adoption of that measure. Equally satisfied are we that other essential advantages would result from it. As, however, your inquiry does not extend to this object, we think it improper to enter further into the subject.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

JAS. MONROE,
WM. H. CRAWFORD,
GEORGE GRAHAM,
Acting Secretary of War.
B. W. CROWNSHIELD.

Hon. Mr. Lowndes, Chairman, &c.

From Mr. Monroe to Mr. Lowndes.

1. The Attorney General has been always, since the adoption of our Government, a member of the executive council, or cabinet. For that reason, as well as for the better discharge of his other official duties, it is proper that he should reside at the Seat of Government. It was made the duty of the present officer, at the time of his appointment, to do so; which he has accordingly done. His duties in attending the cabinet deliberations are equal to those of any other member.

2. Being at the Seat of Government throughout the year, his labors are increased by giving opinions to the different Departments and public offices. The proportion of increase could be in part ascertained by an examination of the files of all of them, and comparing the opinions given now with heretofore, when the office was at a distance. But this is not all. Being on the spot, it may be supposed that he will often be resorted to verbally in the progress of current business. Such is the fact. The removal of the office has more than doubled its entire business under this head.

3. The Supreme Court. At the last term of the Supreme Court there were forty-nine causes of the United States upon the docket. Of this number, twenty-three were ultimately disposed of by argument or otherwise. Four others were argued without being decided. Under such circumstances, the Attorney General cannot well engage in the causes of private clients in this court, consistently with a diligent execution of the public business.

The present Attorney General has not embarked in the practice of the local courts of the city of Washington. The practice is, in itself, of little moment; and to engage in it upon a scale to make it, in any degree, worth his attention would be incompatible with the calls to which he is liable from the Executive, and the investigations due to other official engagements.

4. The office has no apartment for business, nor clerks, nor a messenger, nor stationery, nor fuel allowed. These have been supplied by the officer himself, at his own expense.

REPAYMENT OF DUTIES.

The House took up the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition of Chancellor H. Saunders and Manuel Judah. The petitioners pray for the repayment of duties paid by them to the Government on account of spirits distilled in the United States; which repayment they claim on the ground that the spirits have been destroyed by fire; and the Committee of Ways and Means report that the petition ought not to be granted.

The report gave rise to some discussion, in which Mr. PLEASANTS opposed it, and moved to reverse the same so as to declare the petition reasonable; and Mr. LOWNDES advocated the report and explained the views of the committee, which forbade relief to the petitioners, as well as the general policy proper in such cases. Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, likewise spoke in favor of the report, after which the question was taken on concurring therein, and carried.

THE COMPENSATION LAW.

The House then again proceeded to the consideration of the bill to repeal the Compensation Law—Mr. HARRISON's motion of yesterday to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, with instruction to fill the blank with six dollars, being under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON, after stating that he felt some doubt as to the propriety of that part of his motion, which embraced an instruction to the Committee of the Whole, requested permission to withdraw that branch of it, and did so accordingly.

Mr. PICKERING moved the indefinite postponement of the bill, and spoke some time in favor of leaving the subject to the next Congress, to act as they should deem proper, when the public ferment shall have subsided, and they be able to decide dispassionately, and also because the House had by its votes shown no disposition to fix on an adequate per diem allowance.

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

The motion for indefinite postponement was supported warmly by Mr. WRIGHT, and briefly by Mr. CALHOUN; and zealously opposed by Mr. PARRIS; when the question on the indefinite postponement was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 115, as follows:

The motion then recurred to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole House, which motion was decided in the negative—ayes 58.

The question then recurred on the motion made yesterday by Mr. GROSVENOR, to strike out the substance of the bill and insert a substitute repealing all the laws on the subject from the end of the session, so as to throw on the next Congress the necessity of acting on the subject, not, he declared, with any ungenerous motive towards them, but that they, coming fresh from the people, might be left to decide freely and unshackled.

The motion was supported, earnestly and at length, by Mr. ROBERTSON; when Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to amend the amendment by confining the repeal to the existing act, and thus leave the subject of compensation as it stood prior to the act of last session, which he modified, on the suggestion of Mr. FORSYTH, so as to revive expressly the former laws on the subject.

After a desultory debate of some time on the motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, and the amendment proposed thereto, the question was taken on Mr. TAYLOR's motion, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 81, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Avery, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bennett, Blount, Boss, Brooks, Burwell, Cannon, Cilley, Comstock, Conner, Crawford, Crocheron, Darlington, Desha, Dickens, Edwards, Findley, Fletcher, Forsyth, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Hahn, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Hardin, Harrison, Heister, Hendricks, Huger, Hungerford, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, King, Langdon, Lewis, Little, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, William Maclay, William P. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Adgate, Alexander, Atherton, Bateman, Baylies, Betts, Birdsall, Birdseye, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Cady, Calhoun, Carr of Massachusetts, Champion, Chappell, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Condict, Creighton, Culpeper, Davenport, Forney, Gaston, Gold, Griffin, Grosvenor, Henderson, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving of New York, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jewett, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Law, Love, Lovett, Marsh, Middleton, Miller, Mills, Milnor, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, J. Nelson, Newton, Pickens, Pickering, Pitkin, Reed, Reynolds, Rice, Robertson, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Paul, Taylor of South Carolina, Thomas, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wendover, Wheaton, Thomas Wilson, Woodward, Wright, and Yates.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the question recurred on the motion offered by Mr. GROSVENOR, as amended.

Mr. RANDOLPH stated that when he found his former proposition supported by so few—not more than sixteen or eighteen—in the Committee of the Whole, he had resolved not to revive it in the House unless compelled by the subsequent course of the business, as it would look perhaps, he said, like bravado, like an offer which no one might regard, to throw himself in the front of the battle; and it was therefore with pain he felt himself constrained to bring it forward now, and try the sense of the House on it. After some general remarks on the course of the debate, &c., he moved the second branch of his former proposition, that was, substantially, to deduct from the pay of the members the excess they had received during the present Congress above the former allowance of six dollars a day. The motion, however, not being at present in order, he suspended it.

Mr. TAYLOR then proposing some modification of his motion, which he discovered was necessary from not being sufficiently definite as to the acts intended to be revived, some of them providing compensation for the servants of the House, but which modification could not be now received, as the amendment had been decided on—

Mr. SHARP, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to gentlemen to improve the amendment, and allow them to make as perfect as possible the bill under discussion, moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; which motion was agreed to, ayes 87; and

Mr. TAYLOR's amendment was again brought before the House; when he withdrew that part of the amendment which expressly revived the act in force prior to the act of last session, so as to confine his motion to a simple repeal of the existing act.

The question was then taken on the amendment, as modified, and decided, by yeas and nays, as follows: For the amendment 85, against it 81.

The question was then taken on Mr. GROSVENOR's motion, as amended, and decided in the affirmative: For the amendment 83, against it 81.

So the House decided simply to repeal the law of last session, from and after the passing of the present bill.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved another section, directing, substantially, that the accounts of the members, for services during the present session, be adjusted and settled in such manner, and by the same rules, as if the act of last session had not been passed; and thereon demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out of the motion the words, "for services rendered during the present session."

This motion, and the preceding, gave rise to much discussion; in which Mr. FORSYTH supported his amendment as a necessary instruction to the officers of the Treasury and those of this House.

Mr. RANDOLPH supported his motion, as substantially the same which he had offered in Committee of the Whole, to refund the excess received during the present Congress, over what would have been received under the law prior to last session; and he entered at large into the general question, repeating his conviction, that the course he proposed was required by every proper consideration; that if anything was done with the law of the last session, it ought to be a thorough retraction of all that had been done, and that the act now passed ought to be retroactive, as well as the compensation law, which was to be repealed.

Mr. SHEFFEY rose to show that the motion of Mr. RANDOLPH would embrace only those accounts which remain unsettled; and expressed his coincidence with Mr. R. that, if the act was right, it ought not to be repealed; but if wrong, and it were repealed, that full remuneration ought to be made to the public. Against the latter course, however, he spoke at some length, as it would be for meddling with a vested right, which the law could not now touch, which opinion he argued to establish.

Mr. FORSYTH supported his motion at some length, and opposed the amendment offered thereto by Mr. RANDOLPH—because, however proper he might deem its operation on the present session, as the members had received their compensation for the last session, it was not his wish now to touch it, or to coerce its repayment.

Mr. CULPEPER thought, if anything at all were done, as proposed by the motion, it ought to be something worthy of the effort; and was, therefore, in favor of a thorough revision of accounts, or none at all.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied to Mr. SHEFFEY, and denied that the compensation received at the last session was a vested right, but simply a contract, as related to this House, between the right hand and the left; and that if the case were brought before a court, either at common law or in chancery, a recovery might be had, provided the present bill pass, &c. Mr. R. supported his opinion by a variety of arguments, and concluded by declaring, that if the subject was acted on at all, he was unwilling to stop short of justice to the public—justice he called it, because, if not so, why pass the law at all?

Mr. SHEFFEY rejoined, and repeated his belief, that those accounts which had been settled, were finally settled to all intents and purposes, being settled under the law of the land, and could not be touched—he entered into various illustrations of his view of vested rights, which he conceived this to be.

Mr. ROOR spoke against the retroactive proposition; because, as he believed, it would be inefficacious, could not be executed fully, and would, therefore, operate unfairly; which opinion he argued at some length to sustain.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH explained briefly the reasons which would induce him to vote for Mr. RANDOLPH's amendment.

A motion was then, about 4 o'clock, made to adjourn, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines who were lost in the United States brig Epervier; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the laws relative to the collection of the internal revenue, so far as to require the collectors within the State of Maryland to keep an office, or known place for the transaction of business, at the county town of each county of their district, and to attend there by themselves or deputy at certain stated times, for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing registers to be issued to that description of vessels denominated sea-letter vessels.

The joint resolution from the Senate to employ John Trumbull to compose and execute certain paintings, was read twice and referred to Messrs. CALHOUN, HOPKINSON, WILDE, RANDOLPH, and PITKIN.

Mr. CADY, after some prefatory remarks, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to report to this House

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

whether there be any bank notes in the Treasury which cannot be advantageously applied in the payment of debts due from the United States, and if there be any such bank notes, the amount thereof, and in what banks the same are deposited, and whether any, and what provision, in his opinion, ought to be made, by law, to compel the banks which issued such notes to redeem the same, or give security for the redemption thereof, with interest.

Some debate arising on the adoption of this resolution, a motion was made to lay the subject on the table, and was carried—yeas 65, nays 55.

THE COMPENSATION BILL.

The House again resumed the subject of the compensation bill. Mr. RANDOLPH's proposition to amend Mr. FORSYTH's amendment, by striking therefrom the words "during the present session," (so as to include the accounts of both sessions in the settlement agreeably to the old per diem of six dollars) being under consideration—

Mr. CADY spoke some time against the inexpediency, the injustice, and impracticability of going into a settlement of the accounts of last session, and requiring a repayment of the excess received over the amount which would have been been receivable under the old compensation.

Mr. PITKIN followed on the same side.

Mr. RANDOLPH declared he was as adverse to the amendment as any one; but it was predicated on the supposition, that the repeal would extend to the 3d of March, 1815; he knew that if the repeal took effect at any time prior to the period he contemplated, the consequences predicted by the gentlemen opposed to it, would result.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion to amend Mr. FORSYTH's amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 101, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Atherton, Baker, Betts, Birdsall, Birdseye, Bryan, Burwell, Caldwell, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Condict, Crawford, Desha, Fletcher, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hall, Hammond, Heister, Herbert, Hooks, Huger, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jewett, King, Langdon, Lewis, Little, William P. Maclay, McKee, Miller, Moore, Murfree, Hugh Nelson, Thos. M. Nelson, Ormsby, Parrie, Pickens, Piper, Randolph, Reynolds, Ross, Savage, Schenck, Sheffey, Smith of Maryland, Taul, Taylor of New York, Taylor of South Carolina, Thomas, Townsend, Ward of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilkin, Thomas Wilson, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Adgate, Alexander, Avery, Baer, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brooks, Cady, Calhoun, Cannon, Carr of Massachusetts, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clayton, Clendennin, Comstock, Conner, Cooper, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Darlington, Davenport, Dickens, Edwards, Findley, Forney, Gaston, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hale, Hardin, Harrison, Henderson, Hendricks, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Law, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, William Maclay, Marsh, Mason, McCoy, McLean, Mills, Milnor, Moffitt, Moseley, Newton, Noyes, Peter, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Powell, Reed, Rice, Roane, Robertson, Root, Ruggles, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Stearns, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Vose, Wallace, Ward of Massachusetts, Whiteside, Wilde, Williams, Willoughby, William Wilson, Woodward, Wright, and Yancey.

The question then recurred on Mr. FORSYTH's motion to extend the operation of the bill to the commencement of the present session.

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to amend Mr. FORSYTH's proposition, by striking out the whole thereof, and inserting a substitute, substantially to suspend the repeal of the existing compensation act until the end of the present session, and to provide that the repealing act should not revive any former compensation law.

After some debate thereon, the question was taken on Mr. GROSVENOR's motion, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Baker, Baylies, Betts, Birdsall, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Bryan, Cady, Caldwell, Calhoun, Carr of Massachusetts, Champion, Cilley, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Condict, Conner, Cooper, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Darlington, Davenport, Findley, Forney, Gaston, Gold, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hardin, Henderson, Herbert, Hopkinson, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jewett, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lyle, William Maclay, Marsh, Mason, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Middleton, Miller, Mills, Milnor, Moffitt, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, Thomas M. Nelson, Newton, Noyes, Pickens, Pickering, Piper, Powell, Randolph, Reed, Reynolds, Robertson, Root, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Sharp, Sheffey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taul, Taylor of South Carolina, Thomas, Townsend, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Wendover, Wheaton, Whiteside, Wilkin, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, Woodward, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Adgate, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Birdseye, Blount, Brooks, Burwell, Cannon, Chappell, Comstock, Desha, Dickens, Edwards, Fletcher, Forsyth, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Hahn, Hall, Hammond, Harrison, Heister, Hendricks, Hooks, Huger, Hulbert, Hungerford, Jackson, Johnson of Virginia, King, Langdon, Little, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyon, William P. Maclay, Hugh Nelson, Ormsby, Parrie, Peter, Pitkin, Pleasants, Rice, Roane, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Virginia, Southard, Taylor of New York, Tyler, Vose, Wallace, Ward of New Jersey, Wilcox, Wilde, Williams, William Wilson, Wright, and Yancey.

So the House agreed to the substitute, and decided against repealing the existing act, until from and after the present session, and against the revival of the previous compensation law; thus leaving it to the next Congress to act of necessity on the subject.

Mr. WILDE, after some introductory observations in favor of adopting some permanent provision, and not leaving the subject to be agitated again, &c., moved further to amend the bill, by the introduction of several sections, proposing, substantially, to provide a per diem allowance of nine dollars, as the future compensation to be allowed to members after the close of the present session.

This proposition was opposed by Messrs. CADY, GOLD, and CONDICT, who spoke in favor of leaving to a future Congress the adjustment of its own compensation; and, after the tedious and varying course pursued on the subject, of acting on it definitively, without commencing anew with the proposed amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH dissented from the opinion, that more time had been occupied by this subject than it deserved, and rather wondered that it was likely to end so soon; he opposed, however, Mr. WILDE's motion, and advocated the peculiar propriety of leaving the subject to their successors. Mr. R. entered much at large into the merits of the act of last session, which he supported, as highly auspicious to the honor and character of the Legislature, and beneficial to the country; that it had been made odious only by the cabals of printers of both parties; that he had no doubt it would hereafter be more justly appreciated by the people, when the public effervescence should subside, and the good sense of the people soberly decide on the subject; and that the succeeding Representatives, coming with the deliberate sentiments of the people, would be able to settle the question calmly and properly.

After a few more remarks by the mover in favor of the motion, and by Messrs. GOLD and GROSVENOR in opposition—

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that the amendment be varied, so as to fill the blank relating to travelling expenses with six dollars for every twenty miles, leaving the other blank to be filled with nine dollars, as the future pay for daily attendance.

Mr. CONDICT proposed to strike from the amendment the word nine, and insert eight, as the future per diem for attendance.

After some remarks from Mr. PICKERING, against legislating on the subject for the next Congress, and especially against voting to them more than a majority of them, he expected, would vote to themselves—

Mr. WILDE said, to save time, and accommodate his motion as extensively as he could to the various opinions apparent in the House, he would modify it, so as to fill the blank, both for the daily attendance and travelling expenses, with eight dollars.

Mr. W.'s amendment, as modified, is as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That at every future session of Congress, and at every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, each Senator shall be entitled to receive, in lieu of all other compensation heretofore allowed by law, eight dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate; and shall also be allowed, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting, eight dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; and in case any member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from any session or meeting, or, after his arrival, shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance; and the President of the Senate, pro tempore, when the office of the Vice President of the United States is or shall be vacant, shall, during the period of his services, be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a member of the Senate, eight dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate: Provided, That no Senator shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of eight dollars a day, from the end of one such session or meeting to the time of his taking a seat in another.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That during the remaining part of the present session of Congress, to be calculated from the time of passing this act, and at every future session of Congress, each Representative, and each Delegate from the respective Territories, shall be entitled, in lieu of all other compensation heretofore allowed by law, eight dollars for every day they shall attend the House of Representatives; and shall be allowed, at the commencement and end of each session, eight dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; and in case any Representative or Delegate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from the session, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the House of Representatives, he shall be entitled to the daily allowance aforesaid; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as a Representative, eight dollars for every day he shall attend the House: Provided, always, That no Representative or Delegate shall be allowed a sum exceeding the rate of eight dollars a day, from the end of one session to the time of taking his seat in another. That the said compensation to the members of the Senate shall be certified by the President, and that which shall be due to the members of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegates, shall be certified by the Speaker; and the same shall be passed as public accounts, and paid out of the public Treasury. And that all acts, or parts of acts, contrary to the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The bill was then, at length, ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. FORSYTH called for the consideration of his resolution, respecting the regulation adopted by the Directors of the United States Bank; but, before the question was put on taking it up, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 23.

A new member, to wit: from Georgia, ZADOCK COOK, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat, in the room of Alfred Cuthbert, resigned.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a petition of the merchants and ship owners in the city of New York, praying that an act may be passed, imposing such restrictions on the commerce of foreign nations with, and on the shipping of said nations entering into the ports of the United States, as are imposed by them, or either of them, on the commerce of the United States, or on the shipping of the same, entering the ports of such foreign nation or nations.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to prohibit all commercial intercourse with ports or places into, or with which the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to appoint an additional judge for the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HERBERT, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Darnall, reported a bill for the relief of John Darnall; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending so much of the act of the 21st of April, 1816, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to authorize the laying out certain public roads, and for other purposes," as relates to the compensation of clerks. Messrs. INGHAM, FORSYTH, ATHERTON, CADY, and YATES, were appointed the committee.

GENERAL HARRISON.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee to which was referred the letter and report of the Acting Secretary of War, on the application of Major General William H. Harrison, respecting his expenditures of public money while commanding the Northwestern army, made a report thereon, stating that the committee are unanimously of opinion that General Harrison stands above suspicion, as to his having had any pecuniary or improper connexion with the officers of the commissariat for the supply of his army; that he did not wantonly or improperly interfere with the rights of the contractors; and that in his whole conduct, as commander of the said army, he was governed by a laudable zeal for, and devotion to, the public service and interest; which said report was read and considered. Whereupon it was ordered, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the papers be transmitted to the Department of War.

After the report was read, Mr. HULBERT said, that, having the honor to be one of the committee who made the report which was then before the House, he felt it his duty to make a few remarks upon it.

The committee, he said, considered the subject an important one. It was interesting to the public, and highly and especially so to General Harrison. The character of that gentleman had been impeached. They, therefore, determined to make the investigation as full and thorough as should be in their power. With such views and sentiments they entered upon the inquiry. They had notified a gentleman who had made charges in writing against the General, and requested his attendance upon the committee, and he had more than once attended. They had read and considered all the documents and papers which they could obtain, and which they thought calculated to throw light on the inquiry, and had examined many respectable witnesses, and the investigation had resulted in a firm belief, and an unanimous opinion of the committee, that the insinuations and complaints which had been made against General Harrison, and which were the foundation of his application to Congress, were unmerited, groundless, and unjust.

Mr. H. said it gave him pleasure to make these declarations. He considered himself doing an act of justice to an injured individual. He said he must acknowledge that he had entertained impressions very unfavorable to the General. The complaints which had been made against him had spread far and wide. The bane and antidote had not gone together. He rejoiced that this inquiry had been made, and he had no hesitation in saying that, so far as the report of the committee should defend, before the public, the conduct and character of General Harrison, it would promote the cause of truth and justice.

Mr. H. said that the General had been charged with unjust and oppressive conduct in relation to the contractors in the army under his command. He said he was entirely satisfied that the General had interfered only in those cases where he thought his duty to the public imperiously required it. In saying this, he meant to cast no imputation upon the contractors; he spoke only of what he believed to be the motives of General Harrison.

The most serious accusation against the General was, that while he was commander-in-chief in the West, regardless of his country's good, he was in the habit of managing the public concerns with a view to his own private interest and emolument. Mr. H. said he could not refrain from pronouncing this a false and cruel accusation. He was confident that directly the reverse was true. There was the most satisfactory evidence that the General, in the exercise of his official duties, in his devotion to the public interest, had neglected his private concerns, to his material detriment and injury. In a word, said Mr. H., I feel myself authorized to say that every member of the committee is fully satisfied that the conduct of General Harrison, in relation to the subject-matter of this inquiry, has been that of a brave, honest, and honorable man; that, instead of deserving censure, he merits the thanks and applause of his country.

PAYMENT FOR LOST PROPERTY.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, from the committee to which were referred the memorials and petitions of the inhabitants of the town of Buffalo, and of the Niagara frontier, claiming indemnification for property destroyed by the enemy during the late war with Great Britain, made a detailed report, which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill for the relief of certain sufferers in the late war between the United States and Great Britain; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

"That they have investigated the evidence adduced by the memorialists, and, on full examination, find that the most of the houses on the Niagara frontier were used by the Government as public stores, hospitals, or barracks. The public having no buildings of their own were compelled, from necessity, to convert those of individuals to their own use, without, in many instances, consulting the feelings of the proprietors. It further appears to the committee that the citizens, in some instances, fearing what might be the consequences, remonstrated against the military occupation of their houses, and that assurances were given by American officers that if they were, in consequence, destroyed, Government would remunerate the sufferers. Without deciding the question, how far the usages of war would justify the destruction of private buildings occupied in the manner above described, your committee are unanimously of opinion, that it is one of those cases in which a generous and enlightened Government would step forward in aid of the sufferers. In what mode this aid is to be administered, has also been a subject of deliberation with the committee. The military occupation was at different times nearly universal, and they are of opinion that no discrimination ought to be made between those whose houses happened at the moment to be in the occupation of Government, and others who were equal sufferers, and recommend that a gross sum be distributed among the whole, in proportion to their respective losses. They, therefore, recommend that the sum of $340,000 be appropriated for this purpose. The amount of losses returned to the commissioner, under the act of the last session, is $654,832 90, which may be assumed as the actual losses sustained. The Government has already paid for losses on that frontier $65,666 50, which, being subtracted, leaves $589,166 40. The committee are of opinion that, on many considerations which need not be stated, it would be improper to vote the whole amount of the actual losses sustained, and have, therefore, assumed the sum which they recommend to the House."

COMPENSATION LAW.

An engrossed bill, "allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and Delegates from Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject contrary thereto," was read the third time, and the question stated that the same do pass—

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to commit the bill to a select committee; which was agreed to by the House, and Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. GROSVENOR, and Mr. HOPKINSON, were appointed the committee, with leave to sit during the session of the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH, with leave of the House, reported an amendment to the bill, which was read and concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be re-engrossed, and read a third time forthwith to-day.

The bill being engrossed, was read the third time accordingly, and is in the following words:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the close of the present session of Congress, the act, entitled "An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Delegates from Territories," passed the 19th of March, 1816, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive any act or acts, or parts of acts, repealed or suspended by the act hereby repealed.

Mr. MILLS of Massachusetts, rose, and moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. M. supported his motion at some length; believing that the passage of the bill, in its present shape, would place the House in a much more awful and responsible situation before the people, than even the act of the last session did; and thought it was much preferable to adopt a compensation now, than to throw on a future Congress the embarrassment and difficulty of the subject, who might be driven to fix a sum much below what it ever had been, and totally inadequate to their services, &c.

Mr. CULPEPER thought there was no danger in leaving to the next Congress the duty of fixing its own pay, as he thought the Representatives of the people would always act with justice to themselves in adjusting their compensation.

The yeas and nays being ordered on the question, Mr. MILLS withdrew his amendment for the present.

Mr. PARRIS moved to amend the bill by striking out the clause which makes the repeal prospective, with the view of making the repeal of the existing act take effect from the passage of the bill.

This motion was, however, decided to be not in order, as was a motion declared to be already decided by the House. The question was then stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

JANUARY, 1817.

Compensation Law.

H. OF R.

Mr. KING moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, with instruction to report a repeal of the existing act, and revival of the former acts fixing the compensation.

The motion was objected to by Mr. CULPEPER, and supported by the mover; when

The question was taken on the recommitment, and negatived by a large majority.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill—

Mr. PITKIN opposed the bill, because it repealed all laws on the subject, which he could not consent to, after pocketing themselves three thousand dollars; he disapproved of the bill in its present shape, because of the precedent which would probably, by this course, grow up, of compelling each Congress to fix its own compensation, and thus continually reviving the delicate, embarrassing, and irritating subject; the ultimate consequence of which, he feared, would be, at every election, to put up the seats in this House to the lowest bidder.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, that the members still retaining their opinions on this subject, properly declined repealing the act as to the present Congress; but, as it appeared not acceptable to the people, they leave the subject open to the next Congress. This was the only honorable course; for, if the act was touched at all, it ought to be retrospective, and every dollar received above the old pay ought to be refunded; that, if the House could have agreed on an adequate per diem, the case would have been different; but, that not being the case, the only proper course, if repealed, was to adopt the bill in its present shape. He, however, to be consistent, would vote against the bill in any shape; but he wished the step taken by the House to be as little discreditable for it as possible.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in reply to the idea, that the next Congress would be driven to fix on an unworthy compensation, said he relied on the Senate for a corrective of such a grovelling disposition; though considering the Senate always as the oligarchical branch of the Government, viewing it constantly with dread, and always, therefore, supporting the authority of this House in opposition thereto, still he looked to it, in this affair, as a corrective for any low and grovelling attempt which might be made to reduce the compensation; that he thought it better for the House to serve for a bare sufficiency to support the expenses of life, indeed for nothing, than to adopt such a course as would bring into the House a certain description of persons, &c. Mr. R. spoke some time in illustration of the opinion already submitted by him in the course of the debate—deprecating that spirit which viewed with unconcern the waste which, he said, had so long taken place in the Treasury, and yet begrudged the watch-dogs of the Republic enough to buy bread. He also went into a pretty general review of public affairs, the concerns of the Treasury, Bank, Military Establishment, the war, taxes, &c., to express his surprise, that the people should be such gulls as suffer without resistance, abuses in all these concerns, and yet set up the act of last session as a goblin, to be alarmed at; but he was satisfied, if they could pack upon this act all their ills, make it the scape-goat, and send it off into the wilderness of the West. He noticed minutely certain periods of English and Irish history, and some of the eminent men of those countries, commenting on and explaining their public conduct; in the course of which, Mr. R. said, he thought himself bound to be acquainted with the great events, and great characters of England, previous to the Stamp Act, because, previous to the separation produced by that and other oppressive acts, it was our country. He would never consent to be considered as an upstart nation, sprung from nobody knows who, when we could trace our descent from an ancient and noble stock;—he spoke, he said, of the pedigree of the nation—not in the spirit of exploded family pride. He would never give up his claim to be the compatriot of Alfred, Shakspeare, Milton, Newton. He occupied more than an hour in a very discursive, and somewhat desultory speech; to which

Mr. PITKIN replied at some length; when the question whether the bill should pass, was decided by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Archer, Ather-ton, Avery, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Boss, Brecken-ridge, Brooks, Bryan, Burwell, Cady, Caldwell, Can-non, Carr of Massachusetts, Champion, Cilley, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Clendennin, Comstock, Connor, Cook, Crawford, Creighton, Cro-cheron, Culpeper, Darlington, Desha, Dickens, Ed-wards, Findley, Fletcher, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Hale, Hammond, Hardin, Harrison, Heister, Henderson, Hendricks, Herbert, Hooks, Huger, Hungerford, Ing-ham, Irving of N. York, Irwin of Pa., Jackson, Jewett, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Virginia, Kent, King, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Little, Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, William Maclay, William P. So the bill passed, and after considerable dis-cussion on the title proper to be given thereto, whether it should express fully all the provisions of the bill, &c., it was decided at length to be en-titled, "An act to repeal, after the close of the present session of Congress, the act entitled, 'An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and Delegates from Territories,' passed 19th March, 1816.⁵⁹

BILL FOR ENFORCING NEUTRALITY.

The House then, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prevent the citizens of the United States from selling vessels of war to the citizens or subjects of any foreign Power, and more effectually to prevent the arming and equipping vessels of war in the ports of the United State, intended to be used against nations in amity with the United States.

Mr. FORSYTH referred the attention of the House to documents before it, to show that acts violating the neutral character of the United States were often committed in the manner proposed to be prohibited by this bill, and remarked briefly on the necessity which existed of enabling the Government effectually to repress such acts of hostility.

Considerable discussion arose on the details of the bill, in which Messrs. FORSYTH, ROBERTSON, BETTS, GROSVENOR, BASSETT, LOWNDES, KING, SMITH of Md., GASTON, MILLS, CALHOUN, and ROOT, took part; and various modifications were proposed to its provisions; amongst which was an unsuccessful motion by Mr. ROBERTSON, to impose the penalty on selling an armed vessel for purposes forbidden by the bill, on the person selling the same, only in case it shall be his own act; so as not to make the seller of a vessel responsible for its misuse through all the changes which might afterwards take place in the property or ownership of such vessel.

Mr. GASTON moved, but subsequently withdrew the motion, to make the penalty applicable only in case an armed vessel shall be converted to unlawful purposes within twelve months after sale, or between her departure from and return to the United States.

Before it had got through the bill, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House, on motion of Mr. FORSYTH, took up the joint resolution respecting the arrangement lately made by the Directors of the United States Bank, and the said resolution was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

And the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 24.

Mr. POPE presented a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Illinois, praying that the inhabitants who resided on the frontiers of that Territory, and were compelled to encounter the enemy during the late war between the United States and Great Britain and her Indian allies, may be allowed the pay and emoluments of soldiers of the Army of the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MCKEE, of Kentucky, moved the following resolutions of inquiry :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what offices created during the war have become useless by the return of peace.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing useless and unnecessary offices.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of disqualifying any person from holding two offices at the same time.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of equalizing the pay and emoluments of the officers and persons employed in the civil, military, and naval departments of the Government.

The resolutions were agreed to without a division, and a committee of five ordered to be appointed accordingly; and Messrs. MCKEE, INGHAM, SHEFFEY, ATHERTON, and ARCHER, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. LANGDON, the Secretary of War was required to lay before this House, the annual expenditure of the Military Academy at West Point, from its commencement to this time: Also, the number of students who have annually entered or completed their education in said Academy: And also, what number of persons, therein educated, are now retained in the Army of the United States, and the offices in which they severally serve.

BILL FOR ENFORCING NEUTRALITY.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day on the bill further to prevent the fitting out, in the ports of the United States, of expeditions against nations in amity with the United States—in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, rose for the purpose of explaining the views of the committee on this subject. The attention of the House had been called to this subject, Mr. F. said, by the President of the United States, who, by his Message of the 26th of December, had apprized both Houses that the existing laws did not enable him to preserve the peace of the United States with foreign Powers. The subject of that Message having been referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, they, in the ordinary mode, had applied to the Secretary of State for information specially on the subject. They inquired what information had been given to the Department of State of violations, or intended violations, of the neutral obligations of the United States to foreign Powers, by the arming and equipment of vessels of war in our ports; what prosecutions had been commenced under the existing laws to prevent the commission of such offences; what persons prosecuted had been discharged in consequence of the defects of the laws now in force; and the particular provisions that had been found insufficient, or, for the want of which, persons deserving punishment had escaped. On the 6th of January an answer had been received from the Secretary of State, referring to certain verbal communications to the chairman of the committee, and stating what were the defects in the laws.* As the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations had not thought himself at liberty to state, on his own authority, the verbal communications referred to by the Secretary, on the 10th of January the Secretary of State had addressed to the committee another letter, more particular as to the facts, stating the prosecutions commenced, how far they had been successful, and how far they had failed. † The information col-

* To give a full view of this question, the Editors subjoin a copy of Mr. Secretary Monroe's letter, here referred to, which has not before been published :

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 6, 1817.

SIR : Having communicated to you verbally the information asked for by your letter of the 1st instant, except so far as relates to the last inquiry it contains, I have now the honor to state, that the provisions necessary to make the laws effectual against fitting out armed vessels in our ports, for the purpose of hostile cruising, seem to be—

1st. That they should be laid under bond not to violate the treaties of the United States, or the obligations of the United States under the law of nations, in all cases where there is reason to suspect such a purpose on foot; including the cases of vessels taking on board arms and munitions of war, applicable to the equipment and armament of such vessels subsequent to their departure.

2d. To invest the collectors, or other revenue officers, where there are no collectors, with power to seize and detain vessels under circumstances indicating strong presumption of an intended breach of the laws; the detention not to take place until the order of the Executive, on a full representation of the facts had thereupon, can be obtained. The statute book contains analogous powers to this, above suggested. See particularly the 11th section of the act of Congress of April 25, 1808.

The existing laws do not go to this extent. They do not authorize the demand of security in any shape, or any interposition on the part of the magistracy as a preventive, where there is reason to suspect an intention to commit the offence. They rest upon the general footing of punishing the offence merely where, if there be full evidence of the actual perpetration of the crime, the party is handed over, after trial, to the penalty denounced.

JAMES MONROE.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Chairman Com. of Foreign Affairs.

† This letter it is also deemed proper by the Editors here to publish, because not before published :

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 10, 1817.

SIR : In addition to the letter which I wrote to you on the 6th, in reply to the one which you wrote to me on the 1st instant, I have the honor to state that information has been received at this Department, from various sources, that vessels have been armed and equipped in our ports, for the purpose of cruising against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States, and no doubt is entertained that this information was, in some instances, correct. The owners of these vessels have, however, generally taken care so to conceal these armaments and equipments, and the object of them, as to render it extremely difficult, under existing circumstances, to prevent or punished by the committee, Mr. F. said, was defective in some particulars, but it was no fault of the committee. It did not appear, from the documents, from what causes some of the prosecutions had failed. However, taking it for granted, as it was their duty to do, that the information of the President was correct, the committee had turned its attention to existing laws, to ascertain the provisions seeming to them necessary to remove these defects.

It was found that the act of 1794, which the circumstances then occurring had called for, forbade, under heavy penalties, citizens of the United States from accepting commissions from foreign Powers within the United States; forbade persons, in like manner, from enlisting or causing others to enlist in the service of foreign Powers; from fitting out armed vessels within the United States to cruise, or issuing commissions therefor; from augmenting the force of an armed vessel within the United States belonging to a belligerent, in regard to whom the United States were neutral; from setting on foot military expeditions in the United States against friendly Powers; and further provided that a land and naval force of the United States might be employed to enforce the law, and also to compel the departure from ports of the United States of foreign armed ish this infraction of the law. It has been represented—

1st. That vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, or foreigners, have been armed and equipped in our ports, and have cleared out from our custom-houses as merchant vessels; and, after touching at other ports, have hoisted the flag of some of the belligerents, and cruised under it against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States.

2ndly. That in other instances other vessels, armed and equipped in our ports, have hoisted such flags after clearing out and getting to sea, and have, in like manner, cruised against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States, extending their depredations, in a few cases, to the property of citizens of the United States.

3dly. That, in other instances, foreign vessels have entered the ports of the United States, and, availing themselves of the privileges allowed by our laws, have, in various modes, augmented their armaments, with pretended commercial views—have taken on board citizens of the United States, as passengers, who, on their arrival at neutral ports, have assumed the character of officers and soldiers in the service of some of the parties in the contest now prevailing in our southern hemisphere.

Information, founded upon these representations, has, from time to time, been given to the attorneys and collectors of the respective districts in which the armaments are stated to have been made; but from the difficulty of obtaining the necessary evidence to establish facts on which the law would operate, few prosecutions have been instituted.

In reply to your second inquiry, I beg leave to refer to the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means, during the last session of Congress, in the case of the "American Eagle," and to the papers enclosed herewith.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH.

J. MONROE.

vessels which ought not to remain there, &c. The act of 1797, amendatory to that act, Mr. F. went on to explain, prohibited citizens of the United States, without the limits thereof, from fitting out armed vessels to cruise against a friendly Power, &c. These laws were found to be defective, on examination, because they only applied the act of 1794 to certain acts "within the waters of the United States," the supplementary act of 1797 to acts of the same character "without the limits of the United States." But there was no provision in either to forbid a citizen from arming and equipping a vessel within the United States, and then selling it to a foreigner to be taken out of the United States and used contrary to law. In other words, the citizen and foreigner may do that conjointly which neither of them could separately do under the former laws.

To remedy that defect, the first section of the bill now before the House was framed, the amount of which was, that any person fitting out, or concerned in furnishing, fitting out, or arming any private vessel of war, or selling or contracting to sell any such vessel, with intent or previous knowledge that the said vessel is to be employed to cruise or to commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any State with whom the United States are at peace, such person shall be liable, on conviction, to a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding ten years.

The second section of the act was to remedy another defect obvious to the committee, and which had been suggested by the Executive of the United States. The present laws were defective in not authorizing the interference of the Executive to prevent the commission of the offence, nor unless there was sufficient proof to justify punishment for commission of the offence. This was the reason of the second section of the act, calling on the owners of armed vessels to give security that they will not violate the neutral obligations of the United States. The committee had been induced to offer this general provision, in preference to authorizing collectors at their discretion to call on the owners of armed vessels to give bonds, for obvious reasons. Persons engaged in a fair commerce, where there could be no suspicion of an improper intention, would be at no loss in obtaining the security required; and, though they would be subjected to some little inconvenience, it was not such an objection as to prevent the adoption of an important general measure. And the provision was made general, further, because the committee were unwilling to throw on the collectors on the one hand the responsibility of making discriminations, and on the other were not willing to trust the collectors, &c., in all cases, because they were not always discreet, and, by the general provision, the effect of connivance or indiscretion on the part of any officer of the United States would be obviated.

But, inasmuch as it was obvious that the evil would not wholly be remedied, without some discretionary power being vested in the collectors, that discretion was given in the third section, to restrain from sailing any vessel in such condition as that, though not armed, they may be as soon as they leave the waters of the United States. That section authorizes the collector to detain such vessel until permission be given by the President of the United States for its proceeding to sea, or until the party enter into the obligations required of the owners of armed vessels by the second section of this bill. The fourth and last section of the bill forbade any foreign ship or vessel to be armed and equipped, or the force of any foreign armed ship or vessel to be increased or augmented, in the ports of the United States, under any pretence whatsoever.

Having thus explained the motives of the committee, and the provisions of the bill, Mr. F. submitted it to the pleasure of the House.

Mr. Root, of New York, said that, of the whole of this bill, though he was not partial to any part of it, the third section * was the most objectionable. He much doubted whether it did not violate the Constitution, certainly more than some nearly analogous provisions which had in former times excited gentlemen on the other side of the House, though he ought not now to call on one side or the other of the House, for it was impossible at this day to distinguish the sides of the House, except in relation to the four walls of the Representative chamber. The present was not an occasion, he said, sufficiently urgent to subject the citizen to inconvenience, and inflict on him sore injury, as proposed by some of the provisions of this bill.

But, what occasion, he demanded, was there for the passage of any law at all? It had been said that some vessels, laden with munitions of war, had been sent to our brethren in South America, which they may probably use in achieving their independence. This, said he, is the case: A Spanish Chevalier, representing the Government of Spain, has complained to our Government of these expeditions, requiring of it not only to punish violations of its neutrality, but also to administer preventive justice. It was extremely desirable, Mr. R. said, that the correspondence on this subject should be laid before the House, for it was said that the Spanish Minister had been aided in his requisitions by the Minister of a powerful Kingdom, and that therefore, to avoid a second or third Punic war, Congress must proceed to pass this bill. Now suppose the Minister of a nation in alliance with that Government, should undertake to insist on this Government doing any act having relation to Spain only—he should say that the Minister would have no right so to act, and that the Government was not bound to attend to it at all. A British Minister would have no right, if the strictest alliance subsisted between them, to demand of us to do an act having relation to Spain only. In the year 1794, when expeditions were on foot here, and the Minister of France was issuing commissions to our citizens, at the demand of the British Minister, the Government passed the law of 1794: afterwards, when Mr. Liston was here as the Minister from Great Britain, and every affection of the Government appeared to be wrapt up in the cause of Great Britain herself, at that time, Mr. R. said, the act of 1794 was amended, to the extent that the Representative of the British Court desired. What more then can they ask? said Mr. R. Do you suppose, if at that time the British Minister had not been satisfied with the law as passed, that Congress would have hesitated a moment to pass a law that would have been satisfactory? He believed not. That law, which before had been passed with limitation, had by the subsequent act been made perpetual, and was now the law of the land. Our laws then were, he contended, abundantly sufficient to satisfy the British Government itself. They are such, said he, as were thought sufficient by her, when she was at war with Republican France: when the affections of our people were ardent towards the cause of liberty in France, whilst the Government, in conjunction with the British Minister, was endeavoring to prejudice the people against her.

* SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, respectively, authorized to detain any vessel bound from the United States, whenever the cargo on board shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war, and when, from the number of men shipped on board, or from any other circumstance, it is their opinion that there is an intention to violate the neutral obligations of the United States to foreign Governments, until the decision of the President be had thereupon, or until the owner enters into bond and security, such as is required of the owners of armed vessels by the second section of this act.

If Great Britain had been then satisfied with our statutory provisions on that subject, why should not Spain now be satisfied with them? Had not the officers of Government, under those laws, prosecuted and brought to conviction many of our citizens, for offending against the laws of neutrality? Yes; but, preventive justice must be established, because the offender cannot always be arrested after the commission of the offence, and this, too, at the demand of the Spanish Minister? Has Spain any right, said Mr. R., to make such a demand on us? Without referring to the acts of the Spanish Government prior to the declaration of war, there are causes enough to call on us to stay our hand before we go farther, on the present occasion, than the laws of nations require; before we pass this act of magnanimity. Is it called for by the spirits of the slaughtered crew of Commodore Porter, at Valparaiso? Or do the mingled ashes and bones at Fort Mims require it? The permission to our enemy to bring arms through her territory during the late war—does that call for it? Or is it demanded by the groans of Americans from the prisons of Havana? Neither of them, he was certain.

For his part, Mr. R. said, he was willing to treat belligerent nations according to the strict laws of neutrality, to give them what they have a right to demand. But he would go no further, especially in the case of this sort of war—a struggle of a people for freedom, against the tyranny of a bigotted Sovereign. What do these laws demand of us? Nothing more, in my judgment, said he, than that the Government shall not countenance violations of its neutrality by its citizens; that it shall punish offenders in this respect. But, what right has a belligerent to demand the passage of preventive laws; to demand a neutral nation to lay its citizens under bonds that they will not violate that neutrality? She has no right to demand it, and our refusal of such a demand can never be a cause of war between the two Powers. The belligerent has the power of confiscation, and the right of seizing goods contraband of war on the ocean; it has, itself, therefore, the power of punishing offences committed at sea; and our laws provide for the punishment of offences against neutrality committed in our waters. What more, he asked, could the belligerent demand? Why, it appears, we must lay our own people under bonds, that they will not violate our neutral obligations. If the principle was correct in itself, it might be applied to an unlimited extent. If the merchant might be compelled to give bonds for his peaceable demeanor, the yeomanry might, on the same principle, be compelled to give bond that they will not go on foot into the provinces of Spain? If the merchant is to give bonds that he will not carry on the surface of the ocean any goods contraband of war or soldiery, bonds may be required of our citizens, that they will not transport soldiery, powder and ball, by land. If this be admitted, then every citizen may be laid under bonds, that he will not go over to aid the Spanish patriots, in the achievement of the great cause they have undertaken. What would then be the consequence? Bonds will presently become too feeble, and restraints of stronger force will be applied. Would you, said he, call out an army sufficient to line the whole southwestern frontier, to prevent our citizens from going over? If the belligerent has a right to demand one inch of preventive justice, she has a right to demand it to be extended these two thousand miles. No, Mr. R. said, they had no right to demand it in any case.

There was no fear of war, Mr. R. said, if this bill should not pass into a law. Spain go to war with the United States! Would Great Britain assist her? She might, Mr. R. said, find her interest in herself exclusively assisting these people, in thus alienating their affections from the United States. Feeling this interest, if by negotiation, by any sort of management, she could attract to her the affections of these South American people, her object would be attained. But, if Great Britain were to engage in a war with the United States in behalf of Spain, on this account, she would alienate the affections of the South Americans forever, and throw the trade of that immense region wholly into the hands of the United States. There was no danger of Great Britain engaging in a war for this cause: she knows and consults her interest too much. If the Monarch of Spain should choose to engage in a war with the United States, in consequence of a refusal to pass this bill, be it so. Rather than submit the United States to the degradation, to which the passage of this bill would expose us, Mr. R. said, he would receive the Ambassador, who had been waiting here for admission for months, from the five United Provinces of South America. A few months ago, said Mr. R. we were willing to encounter in war the most powerful nation on the earth—to take the British Lion by the beard. What are we called on to do now? To succumb and humble ourselves at the feet of the Spanish Jack. I cannot consent to it. Let the Chevalier speak proudly of the Castilian spirit of his nation—I object not to his doing so; but I am unwilling that the American nation shall be humbled before it. Mr. R. therefore moved to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that it appeared to him, from the observations of the gentleman from New York to-day, and from those which had yesterday been made on the subject, that the third section of the bill had not been completely understood. The third section did not forbid, nor at all restrain, our citizens from selling munitions of war to whomsoever they pleased. The object of that section was merely to carry into effect the second, which, without it, would be very easily eluded. A vessel pierced for guns, and capable in every respect of being a private vessel of war, manned completely, might, under existing laws, go to sea without any appearance of arms on her deck; (her armament of cannon being concealed beneath the deck,) and, the moment she was out of sight of the coast or clear of detection, take out her guns, evade the laws, and become at once a completely equipped armed vessel. By this bill, it was proposed to authorize the collector to examine any vessel going to sea, and see whether she had such an armament as would enable her, when she got to sea, to fit herself for war. If so, the collector was authorized to stop such until he could make report of her to the President of the United States, and receive his decision respecting her. If proper, she would be permitted to proceed to sea; if otherwise, she would and ought to be detained. The necessity for this provision, Mr. S. illustrated by examples familiar to his mercantile knowledge. The exportation of arms, in vessels not prepared to fight their way, was, he said, a simple business of commerce, and not affected at all by this bill; the only restraint upon it being the risk of capture for carrying contraband of war. Where then could be pointed out an injury to the honest merchant, as likely to flow from this third section? It could do no harm, on the one hand; but without it, on the other, the second section of the bill would be of no use. We, said Mr. S., who are engaged in the East India trade, must arm for defence against the picaroons that infest the islands along the coast of that country. To such vessels there will be an inconvenience in giving the bond required by the third section; but one must submit to the inconvenience, to prevent abuses by persons, who, for the sake of gain alone, implicate the Government in a conduct which must be reproached by all considerate men.

Had such a law as this been in force, Mr. S. said, the collector of New York would not have had to pay a hundred and twenty thousand dollars for having stopped a vessel built and equipped in that port, from being delivered into the hands of one of the black Emperors. If your present laws on this subject are permitted to remain, said Mr. S., you must pass some act to enable your officers to execute them. The principle of the bill was not new, he said, having been adopted by successive Congresses. Why have laws that we cannot execute, and thus expose our officers to vexatious law-suits, and to the loss of money, a loss ultimately devolving on the United States?

The honorable gentleman last up, was mistaken in saying that this bill would prevent the supplying of munitions of war to men who were fighting for their liberty. This bill, Mr. S. said, provided only that the Government should not be implicated by the citizen in his enterprise. Arms might still be exported to any extent, but in the common way of merchants, not by force of arms, but by swift sailing. We are not authorized by the laws of nations, to arm and force a trade in munitions of war with one or two belligerents, in respect to both of whom we are neutral.

The honorable gentleman from New York has told us, said Mr. S., that out-of-doors information says, that the Spanish Minister, aided by the Minister of a powerful nation, had demanded of the United States to take the course now proposed. Out-of-doors information, said Mr. S., is often wrong, and I trust is not right on the present occasion. The committee took every means in their power to inform themselves on this subject, and nothing had appeared which could be interpreted into an interference of the British Minister on the subject. It would have ill become the British Government to pursue such a course. They carry on a trade in munitions of war to the Spanish patriots of Buenos Ayres, in the same manner as we do to other parts of the provinces; although, said Mr. S., I have never understood that they fit out privateers in their waters, and fight for the security of that trade. I believe, sir, the British Minister has not made the interference spoken of by the gentleman. I speak from my own information only; but, if such had been the case, it would have been the duty of the Secretary of State to have given information of it to your committee; and your committee, as well as this House, would have regarded it as a very impertinent interference. That no such thing had occurred, Mr. S. said he fully believed. If Great Britain should insist upon our doing an improper act in relation to Spain, the Executive of the country would know how to treat the interference. Neither this nation, nor the Executive, would bow to the mandate or call of any foreign nation to do what it thought improper; and no nation would make a demand of that sort but would get a proper answer from this Government.

Had Spain, the gentleman asked, any right to require of us the passage of such a bill? Was it called for by the acts of that Government? She has a right to make a demand of us, said Mr. S., similar to that which we made of her, when she permitted French privateers to fit out in her ports and commit depredations on the commerce of the United States. We made a representation on the subject, and demanded of the Spanish Government that the practice should not continue, and that they should pay us for every depredation which had been so made on our commerce. What may the Spanish Minister demand in return? That you should not permit your citizens to fit out and man with your scamen vessels within the ports of the United States to depredate on her commerce? Are not the cases in point? What did Spain say in reply to our demand? She said yea; but she had not, it is well known, the means of then doing what she was willing to have done. She said, she could not help what had taken place, but was not only willing to pay you for depredations by Spanish privateers, but by French privateers fitted out of Spanish ports. She was not able, but declared her willingness. When, Mr. S. said, we had subsequently made a treaty with Bonaparte, then First Consul, we released France from all demands on her as to depredations on the high seas, and the plunder that her people had made on our commerce. We gave it up for what was considered a quid pro quo. We were bound to guarantee the French West India islands, rather than continue which guarantee, Mr. S. said, we had agreed to give up our claims for depredations committed on our commerce prior to that treaty by France. When Spain then had heard that we had agreed to give up all claims for depredations committed by France, she argued, that she could no longer have claims on France for her depredations since we had released her, and that therefore she (Spain) was no longer bound to indemnify us. What had since been done on this question, Mr. S. said, he knew not; but he took it for granted, that our Government would persist in the demand, and never relinquish it.

Was it not possible, that Spain would now prefer a claim for losses sustained from depredations on her commerce by vessels fitted out of our ports? Mr. S. said he was very much afraid she would, and was therefore desirous to arrest them, that the amount might not be further increased. I am not, said Mr. S., the apologist of any foreign Government. When they commit aggressions on us, when they violate our rights, it is the duty of our Government to resent and correct the proceeding. If the Spaniards at Valparaiso injured us, our Government knows how to make the demand for redress, and we know how to enforce it.

The gentleman from New York, who, Mr. S. said, was perhaps better acquainted with the laws of nations than him, seemed to think it was not the duty of the United States to stop a military force from marching from the territories of the United States against the Spanish provinces. That individuals might embark in foreign war consistently with the law of nations, no one could deny; it was done by foreigners in every war, for the purpose of acquiring military knowledge. But would it not be considered a violation of the laws of nations to permit the enlisting or enrolling men in our territories to fight on one side or other of the two belligerents? [Mr. Root explained that his observations applied to the adoption of preventive laws only, carried to too great an extent.]

The gentleman had said he was not afraid of a war with Spain. I believe, said Mr. S., there is no American afraid of a war with Spain. But the gentleman had gone into an argument to show that it would be to the interest of Great Britain to get hold of the affections of the people of South America, that she might shut us out from the trade. Wherever there is trade, said Mr. S., the industry, enterprise, and talents of the American merchant will enable him to find his way there, and to carry it on, on equal terms, with any nation on earth. I do not think, sir, that Great Britain would be extremely provoked, that it would make her entirely unhappy, that the Spanish provinces should become free; it is not impossible but she may aid them in accomplishing their object. If so, their trade will be open to all nations, and there is no fear but we shall have our chance at it.

Mr. S. concluded by saying he could see no injury that could result from the third section of the bill, and should therefore vote against striking it out.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, was in favor of the motion to strike out the third section of the bill. He contended that it was contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution to authorize seizures without a previous oath to sustain them. He denied the expediency of the whole bill. Had gentlemen forgotten the case of the bill to prohibit intercourse with St. Domingo, which some years ago unanimously passed this House, but was rejected by the almost unanimous vote of the Senate? This, he said, was, like that, a diplomatic question, to be settled by treaty; and, if it was necessary to have any provision of this sort, let it be established by treaty. Are we so anxious, he asked, after the favor of Spain at this time, that we will bind our merchants' hands fast, when the hands of Spain are not tied? He did really hope, he said, that this House would take care not to exercise their legislative functions in and over a diplomatic question. In regard to the St. Domingo question, the Senate had determined that to be a treaty question; and all the members of the House of Representatives who had heard the debate concurred in the correctness of that view of the question; one honorable and distinguished gentleman he referred to, now no more, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) had particularly expressed his convictions on the subject. Mr. W. said in this case he would, so far from going wider than necessary, go as near the wind as he could, to keep within the prescriptions of the law of nations. While there was an outstanding debt from Spain to us of immense amount, which she had on every pretext refused to pay, and had besides practised upon us every art to favor France, first against us, and then Great Britain—it was now proposed, forsooth, that we should take part against our own citizens to please Spain! He was wholly averse to it. He moved that the Committee should rise to give gentleman an opportunity to examine, whether an act regulating the intercourse between two nations, was a legislative or a diplomatic act. This bill, he said, was to restrain the enterprise of our own citizens in the cause of liberty; for he had never heard an intimation that these enterprises had been fitted out in favor of the Royalists. We owe Spain something for the aid received from her in our Revolution; but, Mr. W. said, he would not therefore calumniate and embarrass our merchants by enacting such provisions as were embraced in this bill. He would not, he said, bind over the American people on mere suspicion of their intention to violate the law in this respect; it was enough to punish them for it after conviction. Spain had stipulated to pay us for spoiliations on our commerce by vessels from her ports; but she never did pay—and we could do as much as that, should she make similar demands on us. Mr. W. hoped we should not be in a hurry in this business, and that the Committee would rise.

The motion for the Committee to rise was not seconded, before

Mr. GROSVENOR, from New York, rose. In the general view of this question, he said he hoped the time had gone by when, in considering what was the duty of this House, reference would be had to considerations not bearing on that point. The gentleman from New York seemed to lament that there were no longer two sides of this House. If it were so, Mr. G. said, he heartily rejoiced at it; and he believed, to a great extent, it was so, and hoped that it would never be otherwise, when questions like this were presented to the House. For, he said, it was simply a question, whether the United States would or would not compel its citizens to adhere to their duties as the people of a neutral nation. On this question, he said, there could be but one party, and but one sentiment. He here remarked on what, he said, was a curious argument. Why enforce these provisions in favor of Spain? it was asked. Has she not injured us? Do gentlemen recollect, said he, that when they countenance violations of neutrality, they in fact engage in the war? If we are to have war, let us boldly go into it, said he, and not sneak into it with our privateers from one port or another. If Spain have injured us, let us tell her and the world so, and appeal to the world and to the God of Battles. He protested against this mode of carrying on the war. What, Mr. G. said, was asked by this bill? The gentlemen from Georgia and Maryland had put it in its true shape. It did not touch the commerce of the country; it had nothing to do with it. It was a question touching the interference of the citizens of this nation in a war waged between two foreign Powers. The report of the Secretary of State had not been read; if it had, it would show (what was indeed notorious to the whole world) that we do now interfere in that war. The question was, whether Congress should adopt legal principles which would compel our citizens to adhere to that neutrality which is the policy of the nation. The gentleman last up had asked whether Spain would also adopt these principles? Mr. G. said, yes. This bill only proposed a mode of enforcing the observance of an established principle, for the maintenance of which every nation is responsible. The Government of Spain would compel its observance, by its citizens, in a shorter way; it would take off the heads of those who should attempt to violate it. Such a course this Government cannot, ought not, certainly to pursue. Every nation has its own way of executing principles, and we can only execute them in the way which is now proposed.

What, Mr. G. asked, was the objection to the 3d section, which it was now proposed to expunge? That the collector was to be authorized to detain vessels on suspicion, without a formal warrant. The same objection, Mr. G. said, would apply to all our revenue laws; and he never before heard any objection to seizure of vessels without warrant. He had heard objections to bringing these principles to operate on the land, in the bosom of society, by searches and seizures of houses, carriages, sleighs, &c., but he had never before heard the ordinary provisions of the revenue laws, analogous to this, objected to as contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. G. said he rose principally to notice a remark of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) respecting the St. Domingo act. That act, the gentleman said, had been rejected by the Senate, because it embraced a diplomatic question. It might have been so argued; it was an odd objection, certainly, Mr. G. said, but there were other objections to it. That act, Mr. G. said—for the gentlemen would recollect, that, though it was rejected by the Senate one year, it passed the very same Senate the next year—was predicated on a demand of the French Emperor, that we should cease to have intercourse with St. Domingo, in order to enable him to compel his revolted subjects to submission. This, Mr. G. said, was a question totally different from that. Had the King of Spain; had any other creature except Bonaparte, ever made such a demand? Spain had not; he did not know that she had demanded anything, but, if she had demanded anything, it was that our citizens should not interfere in the war in which the nation is neutral. I know, said Mr. G., that this bill goes a great length; but, certainly without going it, we cannot cure the evil. I have had some acquaintance with this affair, and shall not err when I say, that whilst the whole mass of the nation is at peace, some of its cities are at open war. Congress might, he said, adopt the principle that they would not interfere; but, if they did, where it would end he did not know, and no one could say.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, said, the question being on striking out the third section of the bill, on that question the merits of all the provisions of the bill were incidentally brought into view. He agreed perfectly with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) that we ought to do everything calculated to preserve a strict and impartial neutrality, so long as we are at peace with Spain; that our citizens should not be allowed to involve us in a war without the consent of the Government. If Spain has injured us, it is the duty of the Government to judge of the injury, and adopt the means for redress. In a case like the present, said Mr. S., although the character of the nation and public law requires that we should prevent our citizens violating the neutrality we profess, yet, sir, I am not willing to go one single step further than that duty compels me. And my objection to this bill is, that it proposes to go farther. We are required by public law to prevent an hostile enterprise to be set on foot in our territory, to be directed against either of the belligerents by land or by sea; but, sir, we are not required to prohibit the sale or transportation of arms to either party, and, if they come for them, we have the right to supply them, and if we attempt to take munitions of war where they should be adjudged contraband of war, the only penalty is confiscation of the property; the party complaining has no right to inflict corporal punishment. The only remedy a belligerent has, where his adversary is supplied by a neutral with the means of war, is capture and confiscation; and we may leave him to that remedy if our citizens choose to engage in such commerce. Is it not obvious that this bill proposes to do more than national law requires of us as neutrals; and is not the operation of the measure as obviously unequal on the two parties? Old Spain may be supplied here with armed vessels and arms as well as the Colonies, who are contending for independence; but she can be supplied as conveniently, and perhaps more so, in Europe; she may build her vessels, and manufacture her arms at home; in either event she sustains little inconvenience from this measure, while the patriots of New Spain are most in need of the armed vessels, and the munitions of war, and have no other place at which they can be supplied so conveniently; our ports are contiguous, and afford them many facilities of obtaining arms and ammunition, articles they want above all others, and are not prepared to manufacture at home. This bill not only provides that our people shall not employ their armed vessels fitted out in our own ports against either party, but that they shall not sell them to any person who may. Nay, it goes farther; it gives a discretionary power to the collector to stop any vessel which, from her cargo being chiefly munitions of war, having an extraordinary number of men on board, or other circumstances, he may believe intends to violate our neutrality, and compel such vessel to give bond and security, in a very heavy penalty, that she shall not do so! Is it safe—is it wise to vest such a power in any subaltern officer of the Government? That he may have it in his power to stop, to harass the lawful commerce of our citizens, merely upon his belief of their intention;

JANUARY, 1817.

Bill for Enforcing Neutrality.

H. OF R.

it is enough to punish acts where they are committed, and not in effect punish the intent; and that on the belief of a collector, from what circumstances he may think suspicious. I recollect, and no doubt other gentlemen recollect, that in the time of the late war a provision like this was proposed to prevent supplies of provisions and other articles going to our enemy in Canada, and some of the gentlemen who advocated this bill opposed the adoption of that, because it gave too unlimited a power to collectors; they would not allow it even in case of our own enemies; they now propose to adopt it for the benefit of Old Spain. Are we interested for the success of Spain in subjugating her colonies? Or are not the feelings of every gentleman on the opposite side of the question? Can we be the spectators of a struggle for liberty and independence by any portion of the human family, and feel indifferent as to the result? Let others feel as they may, I cannot, and will not disguise my feelings. My most fervent wish and desire is, liberty and self-government to Main and South America; their cause is one that must and ought to be interesting to us; they are contending against tyranny and superstition of the most gloomy and hateful character, and whether they are sufficiently informed to secure, as we have done, the blessings of civil and political liberty, is a question with some gentlemen; but, be that as it may, it is incontestable they cannot be cursed with a worse government than the one against which they are arrayed; and, at all events, they are entitled to the right of self-government, let their change of the form be what it may. Then, I say, shall we in such a contest, for such a cause, pass an act that shall give aid to their subjugation, or lessen their means of resistance? Mr. Chairman, I hope not. My best wishes are for the success of those patriots, in opposition to Spain; theirs is the cause of liberty; it is the cause of my heart. When the French revolution, at its commencement, gave hopes to the world of the emancipation of that nation; when the tyrants of Europe were combined in common cause against her success; was there seen an American who did not think the laws then enacted to preserve our neutrality, and to prevent enterprises being fitted out in favor of France, went far enough, and did not many believe they went too far? and yet those laws are in force and of a general nature, and can be applied to prevent any violations of neutrality by our citizens. But gentlemen wish to do more, and perhaps without such intention they are indirectly giving aid to Spain to subjugate an extensive portion of our Continent. Could this course be reconciled to our love of republican institutions? Or shall we despond for the rest of the world, because that blaze of freedom that for a moment illuminated France, has been quenched in blood, and she has again bowed her neck to the yoke; or should we not rather hope for the success of liberty in a new soil and country like our own, and at least do nothing to thwart its progress and establishment?

Mr. RANDOLPH. of Virginia said he had been extremely surprised to hear the doctrines that had been advanced by the gentleman who had just now sat down. The gentleman talked about the obligations of neutrality; but his doctrine did not apply, Mr. R. said, to a portion of a nation in arms against another portion of it, until the revolted portion was acknowledged as free, sovereign, and independent. Let it be remembered, that this was not a war between Spain and another independent political association, because the independence of the colonies had never been acknowledged. But it was a civil war; a war of one portion of the Kingdom, against that portion in which the governing power resides—in which it is impossible to refuse to maintain that neutrality which it is our duty to maintain between the two belligerents, without being at once a party in the contest. Did gentlemen recollect, Mr. R. asked, the case between these colonies and Great Britain, and in what way France became a party to that war? In the same way the United States may and probably will become a party to the war between Spain and her colonies; by fitting out arms on colonial account from her ports, for the purpose of carrying on the war, public and private, against the mother country. In that way, he repeated, France had become a party to the war; in that way we might and probably should become a party to the present war. Now, said Mr. R., if we are prepared to take sides between Spain and her colonies, let us say so; but, if not, let us do those things incumbent on us, to prevent being drawn in on one side or the other. Mr. R. remarked on the fanciful theory of gentlemen, and a sort of visionary idea they appeared to have, of the struggle in question being one for the right of self-government, &c. When the people of Spain, from the rock of Gibraltar to the pass of Roncesvalles, was in arms against the authority of the government established there by the French, there had not been, Mr. R. said, any of this feeling for a great and generous nation, asserting the right of self-government—nothing of the sort. On the contrary, the United States had preserved what they called a neutral attitude—a neutrality calculated, as far as our means went, to subserve the cause of one of the parties, he did not say which. If, said Mr. R., we are prepared to take part between Spain and her revolted colonies, let us say so, and act an open, manly, and generous part. But, for my share, I have had enough of revolutions, and I have had enough of war; and I cannot say, with an honorable member from Maryland before me, (Mr. SMITH,) that I am not afraid of a Spanish war. I should be afraid of a war with the Sandwich Islands; I should be afraid of a war with the Cherokees or Creeks; I should be afraid of a war with anything, unless perchance with the barbarians of the Mediterranean coast of Africa. I am afraid of war; we have found the consequences of it; and, if we go to war with Spain, it is not for me or the gentleman from Maryland to say, when or on what terms we shall make peace with the allied Powers. I do not wish to make peace with them, said Mr. R., for the plain reason that I do not wish to make war with them. This bill had been called, and properly called, a bill for making peace between His Catholic Majesty and the town of Baltimore; and, Mr. R. said, he was willing to contribute all in his power to the restoration of peace between those high contracting parties. I have said (he continued) that I am tired of war; that I am sick of revolutions; I am tired of having the medicine of the physician substituted for my daily food; I am tired of having extreme cases made daily cases, not of exception but of practice.

The honorable gentleman from New York had said that he rejoiced that there was now but one side of the House. And, Mr. R. said, he rejoiced in it too; and nothing had more contributed to that state of things, than the conduct of a part of this House, to which the gentleman from Kentucky had adverted, about the Canadian supplies, and the conduct of certain districts of the United States, in relation to the late war—circumstances, he said, calculated to cover forever, with confusion and disgrace, those who were authors or partakers of them. Nothing had contributed so much to the unanimity of the late Presidential election, which was not owing so much to the confidence of the people in those elected, as to the paralysis of that opposition.

Mr. R. said he should not have troubled the House on this occasion, but for the allusion to the St. Domingo act, passed on the 28th day of February, 1806. You, sir, said Mr. R., (addressing the Chairman,) remember well that day—it was just at the close of a period, within which, after sitting for weeks in conclave, the policy of this country had taken a direction which has since governed the ship of State. The act referred to was passed at that memorable session when the politics of the United States assumed, in the eye of all those who know how to judge of events, a definitive direction as to the two great Powers of Europe. I voted for it, said Mr. R., after endeavoring, with our doors shut and with the doors open, to arrest that career, and expose that fatal policy which brought us to what we have seen, and what we now feel. And when I was asked why I voted for this famous St. Domingo act—an act which was said—it was so said; I speak in the impersonal—which was said to have been passed under terror of the displeasure of His Majesty the Emperor and King of France. Referring to the saying of Charles XII. respecting Riga, that God had given it to him, and the Devil should not take it away from him, Mr. R. applied it to the sceptre of Napoleon; which, whether or not the Devil gave it to him, we certainly know that the hand of God took from that oppressor—yes, that malefactor of mankind—that hostis humani generis. When he spoke of that man in this way, he said, it was with recollections of the date of this act, and not of his present condition. In his present condition, he would not triumph even over him; he looked upon his former elevation to have been the result of a timid acquiescence in what had been called public sentiment, in the Reign of Terror—when heads had been lopped off, and men tortured in every way ingenuity could devise—all in obedience to public sentiment! when a few executioners, with the words "public sentiment" in their mouths, mangled and massacred whatever was valuable in that once noble country. Yes, he said, it was a noble country, and the country of a noble people. When, said he, (resuming the thread of his discourse) I was asked, on what grounds I should justify my vote, I answered, on none that had been assigned, and unquestionably not on some that were not assigned. I voted in favor of it, because I considered St. Domingo as an anomaly among the nations of the earth; and I considered it my duty, as an American politician—as an American statesman, if you will allow me to apply that observation to myself—as a Representative, above all, of the Southern portion of the United States, to leave nothing undone which could possibly give to the white population in that island an ascendancy over the blacks; for, if ever anything called for a perpetual embargo on all intercourse, it was the state of that country.

I am tired of war, said Mr. R., but I do not therefore expect to escape it. Little does he know of the condition of mankind; little does he know of the signs of the times on the other side of the Atlantic or on this, who supposes the repose of the world is settled. The heaven is at work in Europe, perhaps more actively in England than in any other part of it, and the virus has been received here, that will produce a state of things very far from that settled repose which gentlemen seem to flatter themselves will follow the late convulsions in the civilized world. But, believing as he did, Mr. R. said he was willing to put it off to the latest day. He was attached to his own country. Let Jews, Turks, or Infidels, fight for their liberty or for their religion; he would have nothing to do with their liberty or their religion. He would not omit to do anything he could constitutionally do, to prevent being involved in a quarrel in the name of liberty and religion, when servitude, and superstition, the most dark and detestable that was ever known, was at the bottom of it. He would keep aloof from it.

Mr. R. said he could see no Constitutional objections to the bill; but if there was, he could almost agree to say, with some of the Constitution fanciers, away the parchment! to secure the passage of a bill to restrain any of our citizens who were sufficiently base, or, if gentlemen pleased, sufficiently enterprising, to engage in such expeditions as it was well known had been fitted out. Gentlemen say, observed Mr. R., that our enterprising citizens must go and fight the wars of the colonies with Spain. With all my heart. That they must go and attack her commerce. With all my heart, if they will not attack ours, nor involve their country in the war. Let Spain catch them when she can, and treat them as she has a right. There will be one advantage, certainly, in permitting this system of private depredation to continue; there would be less capital, less of this generous enterprising spirit left, to engage in another trade which we have already attempted to prohibit by law—that is, the infernal slave trade.

But the gentleman from Maryland had told the House that he knew well enough, wherever there was a trade, there Great Britain, and, not only her, but New Britain, would find the way. This, Mr. R. intimated, was exemplified in the trade to which the gentleman from Kentucky had adverted. The character of that trade, which had been practised for some years past too extensively, might be summed up in three words: it might be called, in short, supplying the Devil with brimstone.

Mr. SHARP said he was aware of the distinction taken by the gentleman from Virginia between a civil war and a war between two independent nations; but it was laid down by writers on the law of nations, that when a civil war assumed a regular shape, the laws of war should prevail in regard to prisoners of war, &c. If so, had not a neutral nation, by a stronger reason, a right to show them the hospitalities due to their situation? With respect to the law relative to St. Domingo, it was true that law did go further than our country was under an obligation to go, but for peculiar reasons, distinct from general rules. St. Domingo, Mr. S. said, was a revolted colony, its independence to this day unacknowledged by its former sovereign; yet we trade with St. Domingo—we go to her ports, she comes to ours. Where would the gentleman find a reason to distinguish between this case and that of the Spanish provinces? If, Mr. S. said, our feelings were enlisted in favor of Old Spain against these colonies, and we believed that self-government would be a curse to them, this bill might be a proper one to aid the mother government in subjugating the colonies. We may go thus far, said he: we have a Constitutional right to lay these restrictions. But, he insisted, on the rules which govern neutral nations in their conduct and commerce with belligerents, we are not bound to pass it, and that we ought not to pass it, because it would be unwise to do it. The gentleman had asked why the feelings of gentlemen were not as warm in behalf of the patriots of Spain in their struggle for self-government, as now for the South Americans. For my own feelings said Mr. S., I have no difficulty in expressing them. When the House of Spain had ground down the people, I felt no aversion to seeing any change which would improve their condition. The putting down of the inquisition, the abolition of monasteries, the reduction of the number of priests, he was glad to see. When the Spanish patriots collected the sense of the people, rallied around their standard, my feelings were interested in their favor more than they had previously been in favor of any effort of Bonaparte. I viewed him as a tyrant; but I cannot view without abhorrence the conduct of the rulers who succeeded on these efforts of a patriotic people—I cannot view, without horror, human nature in such a state of baseness, as to exhibit such ingratitude as has been shown. Mr. S. said he would never suffer himself to take any part to sustain the dominion of that Monarch.

JANUARY, 1817.

And, when he saw such similarity in the struggle in which the people of South America were engaged, although not so much enlightened as our people were to the struggle of our Revolution, he most sincerely and heartily desired success to that enterprise which should give the right of self-government to any portion of this continent. For these reasons he should vote for striking out the third section of the bill.

Mr. SHEFFEX, of Virginia, said he understood it to be the policy of the Government of the United States, to observe a strict neutrality between the old country of Spain and her colonies in rebellion against her. If that was the determination of this country, it was the duty of the constituted authorities to carry that determination into effect, and not to manifest neutrality when, in fact, our citizens were taking part with one belligerent, and against the other. To prevent this, the provisions of this bill had been reported, which Mr. S. approved. What sort of sincerity do we exhibit, he asked, if we permit persons to fit out expeditions in our ports, and, after they had gone to sea, pretend to prosecute them when beyond the reach of our jurisdiction? The Government should not act at all, unless it acted effectually; to enable it to do which, the power proposed to be given by this bill was essential.

As to our feelings on the subject of the existing war, that, Mr. S. said, was wholly out of the question. If the Government, or the House, feel as the gentleman from Kentucky does, it becomes us to act a different course—to take a stand in support of those who are contending against the tyrant of the European country. All this display of feeling, Mr. S. said, might do honor to the heart, but, after the experience of past years, it certainly did no great honor to the head. After the failure of the great struggle on the old Continent, in favor of civil liberty in Europe, they must be sanguine indeed who anticipate its success in a population so much more ignorant and unenlightened. The slight dawning of liberty in France had been, he said, perhaps the greatest curse that human liberty ever had. No more favorable consequences are likely to result from the contest in South America. There will be strife and bloodshed of long duration, but which will settle down in a despotism perhaps more dark than has heretofore prevailed there. If a population like that of the Spanish provinces is to be emancipated, it will not be by revolution, but by receiving gradually the principles of civil liberty. And when gentlemen compared their struggle with that of the people of this country in the Revolution, they were widely mistaken. We, said he, were nurtured in the principles of civil liberty; the colonists were as free before the Revolution as we are at this time; we contended not for revolution, though it naturally ensued, but for the preservation of the rights of Englishmen. We were free, and we desired to remain so. The contest in South America, on the other hand, is a contest of slaves to become freemen, which cannot succeed by the exertions of physical force merely, but must be preceded by the gradual expansion of the human intellect, and the adaptation of the mind to the principles of free government.

It had been said that a war with Spain was not to be deprecated. In one point of view it might not. But in another, it was more to be deprecated than a war with any other country. We might succeed, even to the utmost wishes of the West, to possess ourselves of the contiguous Spanish territory. That was a consequence he should deprecate, Mr. S. said, more than any other. When that happens, our moral character is destroyed—our liberty is gone. In such success he saw greater evils than in any defeat. He dreaded it on the score of the moral character of the nation—on the score of that liberty which he hoped would be perpetual.

As to this question he had, he said, different feelings from some of the gentlemen who had spoken. Those persons who were engaged in this trade constituted perhaps a ten thousandth part of our population; and when he said they were not the most worthy part of the population, he thought he was not far mistaken. He would go, he said, to the farthest extent of the Constitutional powers to preserve the neutrality of the country, because he would not suffer a few worthless men, who have no home, no country, to sacrifice the peace of the nation. He would rather go a little further than propriety would warrant, if there must be an excess on one side or the other—by no means however countenancing excess in either way. Those concerned in these expeditions are not, the most of them at least, the worthy part of the community, and, such as they are, form but an inconsiderable portion of it. The consequences of the war, if war should be the consequence of neglecting to restrain them, must be borne by the honest and worthy part of the nation, and therefore he deprecated such a result.

The third section of the bill, he said, was a necessary corollary from the second. The third section was intended to give the Government power to prevent the intention of the act from being violated. It was justifiable on the same principles as, on land, authorizes the magistrate to bind the hands of a man attempting a violation of the peace, &c.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, prefaced his observations by saying, that, in direct opposition to the gentleman from Virginia, he most cordially wished success to the people of South America, in the noble, virtuous, and patriotic cause in which they were engaged. But, he said, he should ever feel disposed to respect the neutral character of his country, and he hoped never to see it degraded in its own eyes, by permitting its citizens, with impunity, to violate that neutrality. He objected to the third section of the bill, nevertheless, because it gave to the officers of the Government a greater power over the citizens than they ought to have. He laid out of view the state of the contest between Spain and her colonies; he laid out of view all that had been said about the demands of that nation, &c. He took up this question on its own merits. The House had official information that acts had been committed by our own citizens, which self-respect required us to put a stop to.

JANUARY, 1817.

This, it appeared to him, would be sufficiently accomplished by the clauses of this act, without the third section, to which he objected, because it gave to the collectors an overwhelming power, viz: the power to seize any vessel, which, from any circumstances, they might suspect of an intention to violate the neutral obligations of the United States, without any proof whatever being required. It might be necessary, for defence against the privateers and pirates that swarm in every sea, that vessels should, at the present day, carry arms, and more than the ordinary number of men, and ought not therefore to be arrested in their voyage. The term "any other circumstance," in this kind of enactment, was too vague, Mr. R. said, to be permitted to go forth. The bill was not only too vague, as regarded the powers of the collector, but as to the objects to be attained—that the vessels thus seized may not violate the neutral obligations of the United States. And what, said Mr. R., are the neutral obligations of the United States? If a definite meaning had been assigned, the merchant would have been able to decide whether he had better give the enormous bonds required, or abandon his voyage altogether. But, as it now stood, it was vague; for, in regard to the obligations of neutrality, the merchant would search in vain in public law, on all disputed points, for a definite opinion, &c., and he might be subjected to ten years imprisonment for going a voyage heretofore deemed legitimate, because his duty as a citizen was so undefined that he could not himself discover it from public or municipal law. He objected to this section, also, on account of the inconvenience it would entail. At a distance from this place, said he, we, in Louisiana, could engage in no commerce, if the collector chooses to detain the vessels till permission is obtained from the President of the United States for them to sail; without which, to be sent for the distance of 1,500 miles, they must give bond in an enormous amount, &c.

And why all this restrictive severity? Was there anything novel in the situation of the world? Had there been any complaints from any foreign nation of violations of our neutrality? If so, let them be known. The Executive had complained, with reason, of certain acts which compromised the neutrality of the United States. Mr. R. was willing to correct them, but not without other reasons than those which had been laid before the House, to give powers so enormous as those proposed.

It was found that in New Orleans the former laws had been sufficient to answer every purpose; and the great objection to them, he imagined, grew out of the same suggestion as had induced the House to alter the claims' law, viz., that the officers, under the eyes of the Government, had not done their duty. Here, within thirty or forty miles of the Executive, the House were told certain violations of our neutrality had been committed, and of such a nature as could not be restrained by the laws now in force. We are legislating on defects in the execution in the laws. If the law be efficient in New Orleans, it might certainly be made so anywhere else. Mr. R. said, he did not wish to permit the continuance of any acts which should move us from the tranquillity we now enjoy; but he did not think this third section at all necessary to the object in view.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, again spoke. In saying that he was not afraid of a war with Spain, he meant simply of the warlike consequences of such a contest; but not in the smallest degree desiring to approbate a war. He deprecated it as much as the gentleman from Virginia; because, whenever we do go to war, he hoped it would be with justice completely on our side. He would, by no act of ours, implicate the nation in a war we could not defend before the world. He should deprecate a war, he said, with Spain, because it would deprive us of the best customer we have. We now supply Old Spain with great quantities of rice and cotton, and, since the war with her colonies, with tobacco; with flour to a great amount—150,000 barrels a year being exported to Havana alone—and with all the products of the country. She was one of the best customers we had, he said, because from her alone could we get specie in return. We enjoy a free trade with Cuba, and, by a late order, with Vera Cruz. He did not, therefore, desire a war with Spain, but he would not shrink from a war with her, if she gave us just cause for it.

Mr. S. went on to reply to the objections to this bill. He showed that, without this third section, the laws might be evaded; that the United States sustained great injury by the violation of this law, by the loss of her seamen, (as well as by violations of its neutrality,) of whom he spoke greatly within bounds, in saying that there were two thousand employed in these expeditions, and forever lost to the service of the country; thus raising the price of labor, and greatly injuring the fair commerce and navigating interest of the country, as he showed by plain and practical illustrations. The mere whim of the collector was not to be sufficient ground for requiring bonds; but, if he saw a vessel requiring twelve hands to work her taking a hundred on board, or equally suspicious circumstances, then he was to act, &c. As to the undefinable nature of "neutral obligations," Mr. S. said, the bond was not to be given in that form; but that said vessel shall not be employed in cruising, &c., against the vessels of any foreign Power at peace with the United States; in which there was no great hardship. Mr. S. repeated his explanation, that this bill would in no wise prevent the exportation of munitions of war, &c., if merchants chose to take that risk upon themselves. As to the execution of the law at New Orleans, Mr. S. said he would only state one fact, that a privateer, fitted out in that port, which had gone out refusing to pay its pilot, or to come to at the Balize, had taken two Spanish vessels within the waters of the United States, coming up to New Orleans; thus violating the neutrality of the United States, and depriving New Orleans of the advantage of that commerce.

Mr. S. said, he did not know that Baltimore deserved all the character which the gentleman from Virginia had flatteringly ascribed to her. Her people were enterprising, it is true, and had some of them, perhaps, engaged in these expeditions, but they were also going on elsewhere, although more secretly than in Baltimore. The commissioner from the Spanish provinces, when he had come here, came with his pockets full of commissions, which had been given to all who would have them. To some these voyages had been profitable, though to others not so much so. A man, seeing a profitable business carried on by his neighbor, not checked by the Government, was apt to suppose that, in following his example, he was not acting against the wish of the Executive. They would have been convinced to the contrary, by the Executive Message on the subject, and he had no doubt would act accordingly.

Mr. FORSYTH, in order to obviate some of the objections against the third section, moved so to amend it as to apply to vessels, only, "of which the cargo shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war, when the number of men shipped on board, or other circumstances, shall render it probable that there is an intention to violate the neutral obligations of the United States."

Mr. F. referred to the provisions of former laws to show that there was nothing novel in this provision. In reply to the suggestion that the power proposed to be granted to collectors was too extensive, Mr. F. said, that Congress, acting at all on this subject, could only do one of two things: expressly forbid vessels going out of the United States without bonds, or else give a discretionary power to the collectors of the customs. The object of the provision objected to, was not to distress, but to benefit, the owners of ships—to prevent their being subject to unnecessary restrictions. It was not going so far as Congress went in the act of 1805, which Mr. F. quoted, and which required that no vessel, armed or provided with the means of being armed, should be allowed to go to sea without giving bond, &c. If any other provision than that reported by the committee would be effectual for the object in view, the committee had not discovered it.

Mr. F. congratulated the House on the view of this subject which had been taken by the gentleman from Louisiana. This was, he said, (as that gentleman had represented it,) a simple question of internal policy—whether we ought or ought not to carry into effect our own laws. The claims of Spain on our justice or honor, or the merits of the contest between her and her colonies, had nothing to do with it. We have laws already in existence (such as all civilized nations have) to restrain unauthorized military expeditions. The President, whose duty it was to execute these laws, had informed the House that the provisions of these laws were not sufficient. The simple question is, then, is the law defective, or not? If it is, the defect ought to be remedied. If the law be not defective, the defect is in the execution of the law, and the blame ought to rest on the President of the United States, for not causing it to be executed. But, Mr. F. said, if he understood the subject, the law was defective, and the defect ought to be remedied.

Mr. F. begged gentlemen to beware how they indulged their feelings on this subject, at the expense of the laws of their own country. It was no sufficient answer, when the law of the country was violated, that it was right, on account of a violation of the law of justice by any foreign Power. If this were allowed, the door would be open to every excess on every pretence. Laying out of this case the odious character which the Government of the United States would necessarily incur, if these things were permitted with impunity, and viewing this as a matter of simple internal regulation, the principle was already established in our laws; and the question was, whether the fault of the non-execution of the laws should rest on the President of the United States, or the legislative body. For his part, Mr. F. added, he was disposed to get rid of it.

After an unsuccessful motion by Mr. ROBERTSON, to strike out of Mr. FORSYTH's proposed amendment the words "or other circumstances," the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on striking out the third section, and decided in the negative—ayes 50, noes 90 or 100.

A motion was then made that the Committee of the Whole should rise, and report the bill as amended.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, (the Speaker,) availed himself of the only opportunity which remained to him, as it was proposed that the Committee should now rise and report the bill, to offer to its consideration a few observations. As long as the Government abstained from taking any part in the contest now carrying on in the Southern part of this Continent, it was unquestionably its duty to maintain a strict neutrality. On that point, there was and could be no difference of opinion. It ought not, however, to be overlooked, that the two parties stood at this Government on unequal ground. One of them had an accredited Minister here to watch over its interests, and to remonstrate against any acts of which it might complain; whilst the other, being wholly unrepresented, had no organ through which to communicate its grievances. This inequality of condition in the contending parties imposed upon us the duty of great circumspection and prudence in what we might do. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had indeed contended, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. SHARPE,) that the doctrine of neutrality had no application to the case, because one party was not recognised by this Government. But, Mr. C. said, whenever a war exists, whether between two independent States, or between parts of a common Empire, he knew of but two relations in which other Powers could stand towards the belligerents: the one was that of neutrality, and the other, that of a belligerent. He hoped the gentleman from Virginia did not mean to contend (what would seem to be a consequence of his opinion) that we were a party to the war, and an ally of Old Spain against her colonies.

JANUARY, 1817.

Bill for Enforcing Neutrality.

H. OF R.

Being then in a state of neutrality respecting the contest, and bound to maintain it, the question was, whether the provisions of the bill were necessary to the performance of that duty. It will be recollected that we have an existing law directed against armaments, such as are described in the bill. That law was passed in 1794. It was intended to preserve our neutrality in the contest between France and her enemies. The circumstances under which it was passed must be yet fresh in our recollection. The French revolution had excited an universal enthusiasm in the cause of liberty. The flame reached this country, and spread with electric rapidity throughout the Continent. There was not a State, county, city, or village, exempted from it. An ardent disposition to enter into the conflict, on the side of France, was everywhere felt. General WASHINGTON thought it the interest of this country to remain neutral, and the law of 1794 was enacted to restrain our citizens from taking part in the contest. If that law had been effectual to preserve the neutrality of this country during the stormy period of the French revolution, we ought to pause before we assent to the adoption of new penalties and provisions. If the law did not reach the case, (which he understood to be doubtful, from some judicial decisions,) he was willing to legislate so far as to make it comprehend it. Further than that, as at present advised, he was not willing to go.

But the present bill not only went further, but, in his judgment, contained provisions not demanded of us by our neutral duties. It contained two principles not embraced by the law of 1794. The first was, the requisition of a bond from the owners of armed vessels, that persons to whom they might sell those vessels should not use them in the contest. The second was the power vested in the collectors to seize and detain, under certain circumstances, any such vessels. Now, with regard to the first provision, it was not deemed that an armed vessel may be lawfully sold by an American citizen to a foreign subject, other than a subject of Spain. But on what ground is it possible, then, to maintain that it is the duty of the American citizen to become responsible for the subsequent use which may be made of such vessel by the foreign subject? We are bound to take care that our own citizens do not violate our neutrality, but we are under no such obligation as it respects the subjects of foreign Powers. It is the business of those foreign Powers to guard the conduct of their own subjects. If it be true, as he had heard it asserted, that Fell's Point exhibits an activity in hostile preparation, not surpassed during the late war, we had enough to do with our own citizens. It was not incumbent upon us, as a neutral Power, to provide, after legal sale had been made of an armed vessel to a foreign subject, against an illegal use of the vessel.

With respect to the other provision, Mr. C. admitted that the Executive ought, perhaps, to be vested with the power of detaining vessels fitted out in our ports with the intent to be employed in the existing war. But he thought the provision went too far, in vesting any collector with such power, under any circumstances which might, in his judgment, amount to a suspicion of such intent. Abuse was too incidental to a power so vested. A vessel in the port of New Orleans, for example, really intended for a lawful voyage, but which unfortunately might incur the suspicion of the collector, was subject to detention until the pleasure of the President be known, unless the owner gave bond, which he might not have in his power to give, and which Mr. C. trusted he had shown our neutral duties did not enjoin us to demand. Before the pleasure of the President is communicated, although it may be favorable to the owner, the voyage is defeated, and the cargo, from the nature of the commodities of which it consists, and of the climate, perishes!

But, gentlemen have contended that this bill ought to be considered as intended merely to enforce our own laws—as a municipal regulation, having no relation to the war now existing. It was impossible to deceive ourselves, Mr. C. said, as to the true character of the measure. Bestow on it what denomination you please, disguise it as you may, it is a law, and will be understood by the whole world as a law, to discountenance any aid being given to the South American colonies in a state of revolution against the parent country. With respect to the nature of the struggle, Mr. C. had not now, for the first time, to express his opinion and his wishes. Another honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHERREY,) had said the people of South America were incapable, from the ignorance and superstition which prevail among them, of achieving independence or enjoying liberty. And to what cause is that ignorance and superstition owing. Was it not to the vices of their Government; to the tyranny and oppression, hierarchical and political, under which they groaned? If Spain succeeded in rivetting their chains upon them would not that ignorance and superstition be perpetuated? In the event of that success, he feared the time never would arrive when the good wishes of the honorable gentleman from Virginia would be conciliated in behalf of that oppressed and suffering people. For his part, Mr. C. said, he wished their independence. It was the first step towards improving their condition. Let them have free government, if they be capable of enjoying it; but let them have, at all events, independence. Yes, from the inmost recess of my soul, I wish them independence. I may be accused of an imprudent utterance of my feelings on this occasion—I care not; when the independence, the happiness, the liberty of a whole people is at stake, and that people our neighbors, our brethren, occupying a portion of the same Continent, imitating our example and participating of the same sympathies with ourselves, I will boldly avow my feelings and my wishes in their behalf, even at the hazard of such an imputation. The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) tells us that Spain is one of our best customers, that we trade with her colonies, send our flour to Cuba, our tobacco and rice to Old Spain, and obtain specie in return. How long, let me ask that honorable gentleman, should we be able to make these mercantile speculations (do they deserve to be taken into the account) after the colonies are subdued?

But, notwithstanding the feelings which he cherished on this subject, Mr. C. admitted that it became us not to exhibit the spectacle of a people at war and a Government at peace. We ought to perform our neutral duties, whilst we are neutral, without regard to the unredressed injuries inflicted upon us by Old Spain, on the one hand, or to the glorious object of the struggle of the South American patriots on the other. We ought to render strict justice, and no more. If the bill on the table were limited to that object he would vote for it. But he thought it went further—that it assumed duties which we were not bound to fulfil, and thinking so he could not in its present shape give to it his assent.

Mr. RANDOLPH followed Mr. CLAY.—He said, that that gentleman had, in the outset of his remarks, furnished an answer to his whole preceding argument, which, if not an abortion from its birth, was, the gentlemen would excuse him for saying, strictly felo de se. He had listened to the gentleman with that attention which he ever liked to pay to him. He had laid down two principles at the commencement of his argument utterly fatal to the whole superstructure: that it is our duty to preserve a strict neutrality in the existing contest; but that these colonies and this parent country—unnatural, said Mr. R., as I allow it to have been; I do not stand on this floor as the eulogist of Spain; I am no advocate of the doctrines or of the country of the Inquisition; I was bred a Whig and a Republican, and I shall die one—that these parties are on an unequal footing, for that one has a Minister to our Court—I may say Court, for we have all the essentials of a Court, and want nothing of it but the name—and the other is not in a situation to make any representation of her wrongs. Did not this settle the question, Mr. R. asked—did it not finish it? How came the latter party in such a situation? How came the revolutionists, these patriots, raise them, if gentlemen would, to the patriots of old—put them on a footing with Aristides or Thrasylbus—how came they in that relation to the mother country? In stating that fact, the gentleman had given up the position which commanded his whole argument: it was no longer tenable; there was a commanding ground above it. Mr. R. pursued this idea further, contending that it is because we are neutral to Spain, that we are also neutral as to her colonies, taking the view and color of our relation to Old Spain. Our Government did not entertain a Minister from the colonies—and why? Because it did not choose to acknowledge them; because the Government did not feel in this respect as the honorable gentleman felt, and therefore did not act as the honorable gentleman would, were it in his power. The House would recollect well, when the very individual who now stood here as the accredited Minister of Spain, was rejected by this Government when producing credentials from Spain “in revolution” against the Emperor of France, or rather against the puppet who had been placed by him on the throne of Castile and of Arragon. On the same grounds, Mr. R. presumed the Government now refused to receive a Minister from the colonies, because they were incapable of certain acts of a political nature. And it was because the parties stood on this unequal footing, that the obligations to neutrality were of greater force on this country, &c.

Mr. R. said he agreed with the honorable gentleman entirely, that it was highly desirable to the whole commercial and civilized world that these colonies should be no longer shut up—no longer hermetically sealed to everything but an annual flotilla from Havana, or a galleon from Acapulco. But that was not now the question: but it was, whether a law should pass for the more complete execution of the laws of the United States. Mr. R. said he was one of those old-fashioned politicians who never had, and never would, act abstractedly—and, if there were no case requiring it, he would not encumber the statute book with this act. But the case has occurred, said he; we all know it, and it is not worth while to shut our eyes to the fact on which, indeed, we are legislating.

Mr. R. made several other remarks, amongst which were these. There was not, he said, any sentiment among the people at this time—and the expressions of opinion from all quarters of the House warranted him in saying it—to go to war with Spain. If there were such a disposition in his breast, he should unquestionably vote against this bill. But, in doing so, he should not bottom his vote on the injuries sustained by the United States from Spain, nor on spoiliations committed by French vessels fitted out in Spanish ports—those which had been once a subject of discussion between us and Spain. Mr. R. said he thought, with the honorable Speaker, that the House ought not to enter into the question—for a reason assigned by the Speaker, and for another: that, that transaction, whenever sifted, would be found to have been highly disgraceful to all three of the parties, France, Spain, and the United States—and, although no keeper of the reputation of France or of Spain, he was not willing to have the whole facts spread before the world now, when they would be of no service, but would serve to degrade the American Government. This quarrel with Spain, he said, had been brought up and laid, as it suited the Government, at different times, &c., and intimated that it was not worth while to bring it into this discussion, for more reasons than because it did not enter into the question before the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR made a few remarks in reply to a part of Mr. CLAY's remarks, wherein he denied the obligation imposed on the Government of the United States, by the laws of nations, to compel its citizens to give bonds that they will not violate its neutrality. If the laws of neutrality, which it was admitted the nation was bound to enforce, could not be executed in any other way, it certainly became the duty of the United States, Mr. G. argued, to adopt that course to which the Speaker had objected.

Mr. CLAY spoke in explanation, and Mr. RANDOLPH rejoined, each at some length.

Mr. WRIGHT made a few other remarks on the bill. He wished, he said, it could be traced to its source. He believed it would be found that it had its origin in treason and disaffection, and came from men whose devotion to kingly governments, and hostility to Republican principles, had induced them to oppose the American Revolution, and who would now rejoice to commit to conflagration that constellation of worthies (pointing to Colonel Trumbull's painting of the signature of the Declaration of Independence.) The acts of 1794 and 1797 went far enough for any necessary purpose, and he, therefore, hoped this bill would be rejected altogether.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

— SATURDAY, January 25.

Mr. CLENDENNIN presented a petition of Elisha Whittlesey, praying that eighteen thousand acres of land, lying at or near the mouth of Carrying river, on Lake Erie, may be granted to him and his associates, upon their completing a good and sufficient canal from the mouth of said river into Sandusky bay on said lake.—Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and means, to which were referred the petitions of Ezekiel Williams, John Heard, John M. Hendricks, Edwin Spafford, and Archibald Hayes, Ephraim Jones, and John Full, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to an act providing for the relief of persons imprisoned for debts due to the United States.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, reported a bill respecting the assessment and collection of the direct tax; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the redemption of the public debt.

Mr. LOWNDES also reported a bill authorizing the deposit of the papers of foreign vessels with the Consul or their respective nations; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which were referred the resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri and the resolutions of the 11th and 19th ultimo, made a report thereon, which was read ; when, Mr. R. reported a bill making provision for the establishment of additional land offices, in the Territory of Missouri, and for the final adjustment of claims to town and village lots therein; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of William Edwards," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made a report on the petition of the American Bible Society; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to amend the acts for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, and for the relief of distressed and destitute American seamen in foreign ports; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the bill concerning the navigation of the United States.

Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs, be discharged from a further consideration of the petitions of the merchants of Norfolk, Newburyport, and Alexandria, and that leave be given to withdraw the same.

Mr. BATEMAN, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to regulate the laying out and making a road from the Ohio river, opposite where the Cumberland road strikes that river, to the State of Indiana; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the committee to which was referred the resolution from the Senate, to employ John Trumbull to compose and execute certain paintings, reported the same without amendment; and the resolution was committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and rejected by the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of relieving such citizens as have had their property destroyed, or so occupied by the enemy, as to render the same unprofitable, so far at least as relates to their taxes, or such other relief as they may think proper, and to devise such means of obtaining correct information, so that the public may be secured from imposition, and the real sufferers relieved.

BILL FOR ENFORCING NEUTRALITY.

The House having gone through the amendments reported to the bill by the Committee of the Whole—and the question being stated on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. PARRIS moved to strike out the third section.

This motion was zealously opposed by Mr. FORSYTH, who contended that in regard to any effect contemplated from the bill on the cause of the South America patriots, the rejection of the bill would not benefit, nor its passage injure that cause. For the success of the patriots, he professed the best wishes; but their cause had nothing at all to do with this question. Those, he said, who espoused that cause so warmly on this occasion, ought to lay a proposition to that effect on the table, and let it be fairly discussed; but the honor and good faith of this country would not permit its laws to be evaded and its neutrality violated by interested individuals without an attempt to put a stop to it.

Mr. PARRIS supported this motion with much earnestness. He saw no necessity for the passage of the bill, and he was averse to throwing unnecessary obstacles in the way of the patriots of the South, whose success had the warmest wishes of his soul.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, spoke in favor of the bill. He argued that it was necessary to restrain illegal practices which, if indulged, would involve us ultimately in a war with Spain, which, if it occurred, would end, no one could tell where, and possibly, if not probably, would lead to a war with other nations.

Mr. JEWETT thought the third section might be amended, but he would vote for it as it was, rather than destroy the vital principle of a measure so important to the character of this country as the proposed bill, which he advocated as a measure necessary to the preservation of good faith among nations, which should never be compromised to indulge private feelings or temporary gratifications; and that no nation was more interested in strictly abstaining from interference in the administration of other Governments, and of observing rigidly the maxim of doing unto others as we would wish them to do to us.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed, in common with other gentlemen, his good wishes of the cause of the South American colonies against the mother country; but that such wishes would never influence him to permit a violation of our neutral obligations. The provision under discussion, however, he thought pushed the restrictions further than those obligations required—that he looked on armed vessels as much articles of trade as munitions of war, and he was unwilling to make our citizens answerable for the conduct of those who purchased their vessels. All that could be done, and what appeared necessary, was to require bond of the purchaser that he would not violate the neutrality of this country—further he could not go in legislating on the subject. He alluded to the nature of the contest existing in the Spanish provinces, acknowledged that its analogy to our own situation in '76 enlisted our sympathies—but all that could be expected of us by the patriots was, that we, being neutral, should do nothing to weaken their efforts or injure their cause.

Mr. RANDOLPH again spoke in support of the bill. He condemned the policy of following the example of European countries, in winking at practices which they pretend to prohibit, and in favor, so long as we professed neutrality, of acting in good faith, and compelling our citizens strictly to conform to the neutral obligations of the country.

Mr. HOPKINSON said that the late debate on the compensation law had so exhausted the spirit of the House, that the present bill was received yesterday with coldness and indifference. He was glad, however, to find that the House began to be awakened to the importance of the subject under discussion, one of the most important that had ever come before the House, and the decision of which deeply concerned the honor and safety of the nation. The subject, Mr. H. said, had intrinsic difficulties. Whenever the peace of the nation requires the rights of the citizens to be restrained, the difficulty which arises is to strike that point which will attain the object with as little inconvenience as possible to the citizen. That point must in some degree be a matter of opinion—though, in restrictive measures, no country had more experience than our own. Mr. H. adverted to the former restrictive policy of the Government, and the discontent which had been encountered by the various acts to enforce it, and into the success of which it was now unnecessary to inquire. Another difficulty, Mr. H. said, presented itself in this case, that every regulation adopted would operate, as the sun shines, on the just as well as the unjust, on those who wish not to infringe the laws as on those who do. What, said he, is incumbent on a wise Legislature in such a case? To produce the desired effect by all means bearing a fair proportion to the object to be attained, and within their legitimate authority. By the bill before you, what, Mr. H. asked, is the result presented to the judgment of the House? The evil complained of is not denied; a crying sin threatens to bring upon us disgrace and the horrors of war, if the Government do not exert all its powers to prevent it. He did not wish to be understood that foreign nations had a right to require of us impossibilities; but a foreign nation had a right to require us, professing to be neutral, to prevent our citizens from embarking in a quarrel between her and her colonies: the quarrel now alluded to was between Spain and her colonies; on that point he found no difference of opinion. In the present case, however desirous for the success of the colonies gentlemen had expressed themselves, he found none, speaking in their legislative, official capacity, who doubted the country ought to lay its hand on its citizens and prevent them from aiding either party in the contest. All agree as to what foreign Governments have a right to demand of us; the difficulty is about the means by which we shall perform this duty. Mr. H. said he would say nothing of the nature of this struggle; he would neither call them patriots nor rebels; he knew them only as two parties at war, and what was or had been the connexion between them, formed no part of this question. There was in the law of nations no difference between our duty in this case and in a war between any other belligerents; he considered it precisely as he should a war between Spain and Portugal, Spain and England, or any other two Powers, and our duty required that we should observe a strict neutrality between them, to wait the result, and take up the conqueror as the legitimate authority. Of the contest referred to, Mr. H. said, from all he had seen, it appeared more like a war between rival chiefs, to serve private views, and promising no great or general good. In no such war, nor in any war, would he consent to embark, unless he saw advantages sufficient to justify it; for that, he should always wait for information from his own Government, and so long as the Government said we must be neutral, he would not listen to who were the parties at war. In this case, Mr. H. said, gentlemen ought to consider themselves acting for a neutral country; and if it be our policy to embark in the war, let it be done legally and fairly, and not secretly and piratically.

H. OF R.

The next question to be considered, Mr. H. said, was, what was deemed by the law of nations a violation of neutrality? A neutral citizen had a right, he said, to trade with a belligerent in arms and munitions of war, if he chooses to run the hazard of being captured; the belligerent had been satisfied with the right of confiscating the contraband property going to his enemy, if taken, and had never looked for any further remedy. But the difference between trading in munitions of war and furnishing armed vessels had been always admitted by every code of national law; and the difference, Mr. H. said, was perfectly distinct, well known and established; because, in the latter case, as soon as you permit your citizens to assist with armed ships, you take part in the war, and add an important force to the means of the other party. To permit this, therefore, Mr. H. contended, was unneutral conduct, and ought to be prohibited. To justify the bill, he then adverted to the public manner in which this illegal trade had been carried on in some of our ports, in which every preparation on board had been made, and everything done to give vessels a belligerent character, but to raise the flag to the mast-head; and whilst we tolerate such violations of public faith, said Mr. H., will not every nation cry out against us? Or can we, he said, denounce the piracies of Algiers and Tripoli, while buccaneers beat up for recruits in the streets of our cities, and the plunder of piracy is publicly sold in the market? A private armed ship even in time of war was at best but of doubtful character; but one which sails not in the service of its own country was to all intents and purposes a pirate. While, then, said Mr. H., we insist on other nations respecting our own rights, let us not set them a different example, and add infamy to the dangerous example. The plea of weakness in the complaining party was no argument, he said, to influence a just and moral nation in its acts. If Spain were as weak as an infant, and we as strong as Hercules, it would not justify the slightest departure from justice, because, aside from our moral duty, the time might come when the example would recoil upon ourselves.

But we have been told, said Mr. H., that the provisions of this bill are not called for by the law of nations, that national law does not require us to place our citizens under bonds for their good conduct. The law of nations, said he, enjoins us to keep our citizens within a strict neutrality; how to do it is a question between you and the citizen, in which the foreign nation does not interfere. If in 1794 this duty was fulfilled by the law then passed, it was enough; but if in 1816, the observance of our neutral obligations requires that bonds shall be given by the citizen, it must be done; the whole community must not be endangered by the acts of a few citizens; the community is bound to prevent it, and whatever means are necessary for the preservation of the whole, must be sustained by a part. In adopting these means, said Mr. H., it is only necessary to inquire whether they exceed the legitimate exercise of the authority of the Government; if they do not, and are necessary to the peace of the country, it is a sufficient justification of them. It had been said that bonds were oppressive, and were not imposed in similar cases by other nations. Mr. H. affirmed that they were not only imposed by other nations, but had been resorted to by our own, in cases far less important. At the period he referred to, the danger now urged, of placing so much power in the hands of the officers of the customs, was not objected to, though the power then was much more dangerous and oppressive. That time, however, had gone by, Mr. H. said; he had forgotten it, and he meant not to revive unpleasant feelings, by bringing it now into view. But, said he, must you prevent the commission of the offence, or wait until the act be committed, when punishment is beyond your reach? Take the case of common life, he said; if a man is seen pursuing his business, not in an ordinary way, but in a manner to give ground of suspicion that he is about to commit an illegal act, is he not arrested and measures taken to prevent the mischief apprehended? Here, said Mr. H., in the ports of a country in profound peace—no enemy known—a citizen is preparing a vessel of war, and carrying out a number of men, greatly beyond what are necessary for the purpose of navigation. Can it be supposed such a citizen is pursuing a lawful traffic? Would not this be sufficient to say to him, Sir, circumstances warrant me in the belief that you mean to violate the law; but, if an innocent man, the security you must give will not injure you? We know that if a man lay before a magistrate, on oath, just grounds to suspect harm, personal or otherwise, the officer is bound to require bond for the observance of the peace. The party accused could not say, whom have I injured?—When I injure any one, it will then be time enough to punish me. No, it is the policy of every nation rather to endeavor to prevent than punish offences.

Mr. H. recited the provisions of the bill, to show that there was no hardship in the means proposed to prevent citizens from pursuing a conduct which might lead the nation into war.

H. OF R.

Bill for Enforcing Neutrality.

JANUARY, 1817.

When an armed ship, under present circumstances, sailed out, he thought there was good reason to presume she was not sent to seek a market, but that she was bargained for, and had the purchaser fully ascertained, and that her destination is to embark in the war; indeed, said Mr. H., she goes not out with the intention merely to embark in it, but takes a part in the quarrel from the moment of her departure. He thought if the sale of armed vessels was fair at sea, it was equally so in port; for a foreigner might come into port, purchase the materials, and have such vessels built as would answer the purposes of war. The argument, that the sale of armed vessels was legal, would, Mr. H. said, carry its advocates further than they were aware, and justify a foreigner in making warlike preparations in our ports with impunity. He contended that, though a citizen might sell his lumber, &c., to whomsoever he pleased, it was fair to inquire whether it was for unlawful purposes, with a knowledge of its improper use; and whether, in exercising this right of sale, he was not injuring others. I think, said Mr. H., when vessels are seen going out equipped even to the powder horn, they can only be supposed going to engage in hostilities.

Mr. H. adverted to the argument of the armament necessary to vessels in the India trade, to which he replied that it was not now common, and was only necessary to defend them against the pirates of the Asiatic seas. The India vessels, therefore, generally took their armament in the hold, to be prepared for defence when they approached the scene of danger, and, on getting beyond the fear of danger, generally returned their arms to the hold again; and they also carried out comparatively but few men. In support of these facts, Mr. H. mentioned the case of the Montesquieu, captured by some British boats in the Delaware, during the late war, while coming home, ignorant of hostilities. In that case, it was charged as a fault to the captain, that he did not use his arms in his defence and avoid capture; but it appeared this arming was merely nominal, for the vessel referred to had not a gun on board fit for use.

Mr. H. avowed himself opposed to giving large power of discretion to subordinate officers—we had had enough of it—but, under the provisions of this bill, the cases provided for are required to be of so suspicious a character that he thought there was little danger of mistake, and that the officer would be very careful not to seize the vessel without good grounds, &c., being on his own responsibility. Mr. H. stated the characteristics required by the bill to justify the officer to proceed; the difference in the number of men, and other appearances, necessary to authorize a seizure, and that the cases contemplated by the bill were such as to leave no doubt on the mind, and which, if not overlooked by the Government, would make it a party in the fraudulent procedure.

The law of 1794, Mr. H. said, instead of providing guards to prevent the offence, only punished the act when committed; in this bill the reverse is the case. It was a strange lot for him, he said, to exhort gentlemen to have some confidence in their Executive. He tells us as plainly, said Mr. H., as he can, that the laws now in force are insufficient—if sufficient, why did he not send his instructions to the collectors and district attorneys to enforce them; why send it here for amendment? If my Executive, said Mr. H., knowing, as he must, everything on the subject, the complaints of foreign Courts, and the weakness of the law, recommend to me this measure, it is sufficient for me to believe it is necessary; but, in addition to this, his own knowledge of the law and the practice under it, proved to him that it was insufficient, and he hoped something would be done conclusively on the subject. This he hoped, not in obedience to any foreign Power, but in obedience to justice and our own laws, and to preserve the peace of the country. That the evil exists; that these degrading and dangerous practices are carried on, almost openly, in defiance of the existing law, is satisfactory evidence that the existing law is not sufficient to prevent or restrain them.

Mr. CALHOUN said the question was, whether the bill did or did not go further than necessary, to prevent our citizens from taking part in the war between Spain and her colonies. In reply to an argument by Mr. HOPKINSON, he said, he still thought to sell vessels to either of the belligerents, was no violation of neutrality, and that a trade in arms and munitions, or in vessels, stood on the same footing. Spain herself purchased vessels at Havana, for the public service, and she could not object to an act in others, which she had done herself. Mr. C. entered somewhat at large into the question of the legality of permitting the sale of vessels to either belligerent party, after their departure from the United States, and in his opinion, the trade being legal, he argued that the third section went further than necessary, in fulfilment of our obligations, by making the builder, or the seller of the vessel, liable for conduct of the purchaser. To sell armed vessels in our own ports to a belligerent, he acknowledged would be illegal, but maintained that they might be transferred after their departure beyond the jurisdiction of the country. The third section would, he thought, operate oppressively, inasmuch as it made the vendor in our ports, responsible for the illegal conduct of the party purchasing, and, in that way, throw burdens on commerce not necessary, and injurious. If this provision were demanded by the neutral duties of the country, it ought certainly to be resorted to, he said, but not otherwise; but he thought it ought not to extend its penalties further than to the conduct of the first purchaser. The experience and superiority of our ship builders, gave to their work a value which made it more sought after, and he thought the policy of the country required that the profession should be restrained as little as possible. The law of '94 had contemplated a war between two independent Powers, not one between a mother country and its colonies; and if the defect of that law could not preserve our neutral character in the war now existing in the South, he was willing to adopt a remedy, but he would not go so far as to prohibit the sale of vessels, while the encouragement of ship building was so important an object to the country. To show the hardships which might arise from holding the seller responsible for the conduct of the purchasers of a vessel, Mr. C. supposed the case of a vessel which, being engaged in the North-west or China trade, should become unfit to return home, and be sold, and afterwards converted to purposes prohibited by the bill in its present shape—to make the first seller of this vessel responsible for the conduct of the purchasers, would be an act of oppression he could not consent to. He was willing to adopt additional restraints, because the Executive had asked for them, but he did not believe any regulations could entirely prohibit the trade proposed to be suppressed.

Mr. WRIGHT again rose in opposition to the bill, and in favor of expunging the third section. He said he felt it to be his duty to oppose the bill as interfering with the treaty-making power, and legislating on a diplomatic subject; and here let me (said Mr. W.) call the attention of the House to the treaty now subsisting between the United States and Spain. The article relative to articles contraband of war, subjects the ship and cargo, violating the article, to capture and condemnation; and the article relative to fitting out armed vessels to cruise against the commerce of either party, subjects such vessels to capture and condemnation, and the crews of such vessels to be punished as pirates, unless they have a legal commission from the Power under whose flag they sail. Thus, sir, by the treaty, the condemnation of the vessel and cargo is authorized, and the execution, on a gibbet, of the offenders as pirates; so that the ultimum supplicium is in each case provided by the treaty. But if this law passes, it will bind the American citizen in a new article not known to the treaty, not providing that Spain will be liable to a like obligation. We have no right to bind Spain but by treaty; and I had always supposed that treaties were international acts, simultaneously taking place, and giving to every article a quid pro quo; which cannot be effected by a statute. And, sir, have we any reason to favor Old Spain by such a measure, in violation of the rights of the patriots? Shall the rights of sixteen millions of Spaniards, equally entitled to our partiality with Old Spain, be thus violated? They have declared themselves independent, and are in the exercise of self-government, which is said to be republican; and if we examine their standing, they will be found the older branch of the French Government, having been in operation before Ferdinand was restored to his Crown. Sir, I hope the noble example set by the Kings of France and Spain during our glorious struggle for independence, will have its weight on this House, and that the representatives of Kings will be satisfied with our neutrality, when their predecessors advocated and aided us in obtaining our independence; and that they will surcease their little complaints, and recollect that it is beneath the dignity of Kings to regard such trifles. They, sir, as the Spanish agents of the Crown, as well as the agents of the patriots, have, no doubt, sent ships and munitions of war to their respective armies; and it very little becomes a Minister who has been violating our neutrality by sending supplies to the royal army, at the same time to complain against the supplies, by their friends, sent to the patriots. Can it be, that this Republican Congress can, by any representation, be led to violate the neutral state of the United States towards the patriots? Have we forgot the treaty entered into between Spain and the United States, in eighteen hundred and two, and her agreement to pay for her spoiliations on our commerce? And need I tell this House that, in violation of her own compact, she refused to ratify the same? whereby the spoiliations of that long date remain unremunerated; and we are, notwithstanding, now called on to extend to her benefits not secured to her by treaty, and which we cannot, by statute, impose on her. I do not recollect, when she was committing her unremunerated spoiliations on our commerce, in violation of our treaty, that she, by any law of Spain, bound her merchants in the manner contemplated by this bill; and I cannot decide which I ought most to reprobate—her temerity in asking it, or our humiliation in granting such a provision. Sir, do not the proceedings in Baltimore and New Orleans sufficiently attest the intention of the Government of the United States to carry into effect the provisions of the existing treaty? No case has been found in Baltimore, in violation of the treaty; and in New Orleans the cases stated by the District Attorney of the many condemnations there, show that prompt and ample justice has been administered. Sir, did not the contracting parties, at the confirmation of their treaty, understandingly act on the subject, and make the provisions of the treaty as they wished them? And if now, at the instance of either party, new obligations are to be laid on the other, without their being reciprocal, they shall be so laid against my vote, though I have no objection to the treaty-making power reviewing that subject, and making such new provisions as may be thought mutually convenient and reciprocally obligatory.

Mr. LOWNDES thought no one could read the act of 1794, without believing that something further was necessary, to preserve the character of the country for a just regard to its obligations. There could not, in adopting this measure, be any appearance of unfairness on our part, and whatever was the character of the contest referred to, it was the obvious policy of this country to make its citizens conform to all the duties due from the nation to a foreign country. Mr. L. confessed, that he hardly cared whether the third section of the bill passed or not. There was some fear that this section would only limit the influence of the Executive authority, without producing the anticipated benefit. Under the existing law, the collector had been sued, it was well known, for enforcing its provisions, and damages awarded against him; and Mr. L. supposed the present bill was intended to justify the collector in making a seizure, when reasonable ground—her having arms, &c. on board—warranted the suspicion of illegal intentions. The use of the section was clear, and his only objection was, that a part of a cargo might consist of munitions of war, in which case a vessel fitted out for the purpose, might take only sufficient on the first voyage to exempt her from detention, and in this way defeat the intention of the law. He had, Mr. L. said, no objections to the bill, because the committee had inquired into the subject, and after full consideration, had deemed it necessary; only, as he said before, the probable effect of the third section would be to limit, rather than extend the discretion of the collector. The law of '94, applying only to the case of war between two independent States, it ought, no doubt, to be extended to comprehend the contest referred to between Spain and her colonies, and not, when prosecutions are carried up to court for breaches of the law, deny that redress we profess to give. It appeared to him, by some inadvertence, however, Mr. L. said, the committee had not gone far enough in amending the act of '94—if it be amended so as to apply to Governments not acknowledged to be independent, &c. He could not concur with Mr. CALHOUN, in considering the ordinary munitions of war, and of armed vessels, equally as legitimate articles of trade with belligerent parties; the distinction Mr. L. thought was manifest. A nation has a right to carry on a trade in the munitions of war, although in such trade the property of the neutral is liable to capture and confiscation; but if the munitions of war are carried in a vessel and by a crew equipped for war, the indication of an intention, which is thus given, not merely to carry on the trade, but to force it, makes it prudent for a nation which wishes to avoid war or even the pecuniary responsibility which may arise from acts of hostility by its citizens, to require in this case, and not in common instances of contraband, a security that the vessel shall not be employed in acts of hostility. If the trade in vessels be proper at all, it ought certainly, Mr. L. thought, to be confined to unarmed vessels, and whenever an armed vessel sailed out, it was a duty incumbent on the neutral to take security, that such powerful means, in the hands of an individual, should not be abused. It would be found that this course of conduct was admitted at least into all books on moral duty, if those called codes of national law did not require it. In time of peace, the application of this rule to those who fairly come under it, cannot be omitted from the fear that it will operate on those to whom it is not expected to apply. If there appear to the collector to be good reason to presume the design of a vessel injurious to the country, there is no hardship in making the individual give bond; and if on going on board, there be a rational ground to believe that she will return home, still she may leave a large majority of her crew abroad, exposed to the temptation of taking part in the war on one side or the other; and the security in either case is proper.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought the operation of the third section would prohibit the exportation of munitions in vessels unarmed as well as armed; as the discretion vested in the collector would permit him to detain, until bond was given, any vessel which he might deem about to carry aid to one of the belligerent parties. This restraint on a fair commerce, Mr. R. did not think required by existing circumstances. He argued, also, that the Government had no right to restrain the departure of armed vessels, as the people possessed the right of equipping vessels, and could not be called on by the Government to give security for them.

At this point the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 27.

Mr. YANCEY from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Alexander Holmes and Benjamin Hough, which was read; when Mr. T. reported a bill for the relief of Alexander Holmes and Benjamin Hough; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of William Chism; which was read; when Mr. T. reported a bill for the relief of William Chism; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House last mentioned.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of ratified treaties between the United States and several Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the town of Princess Anne, in Somerset county, in the State of Maryland.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled, "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin, deceased," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ALEXANDER made a report on the petition of Joseph J. Green; which was read; when, Mr. A. reported a bill for the relief of Joseph J. Green; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

CALEB NICHOLS.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on Claims, made a report on the petition of Caleb Nichols; which was read; when Mr. A. reported a bill for the relief of Caleb Nichols; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.—The report is as follows:

That, in the month of September, in the year 1814, the village of Plattsburg was invaded and taken possession of by the British forces, then under the command of Sir George Prevost, and that they remained in possession thereof for several days; that Plattsburg is within cannon-shot of Fort Moreau; and that the commanding officer of that fort, under the orders of the commanding General of the American army then at that place, did order the artillery from the fort to play upon the houses near the court-house in Plattsburg, for the purpose of dislodging the enemy; and that a firing was accordingly kept up from the fort for several days, between the 5th and 12th of September, 1814.

The petitioner states that his store and office stood immediately under the guns of the fort (Moreau,) and were fired upon from the 6th to the 11th of September, 1814; and that a cannon ball from the fort passed through a puncheon of St. Croix spirits, which then stood in the store, containing about one hundred gallons, which, in his estimation, was worth $250, and which was all lost. He asks relief from Congress in the premises generally.

There is no evidence whatever before the committee of the loss of the spirits as stated by the petitioner; but the committee are perfectly satisfied that the store and another house of the petitioner, both standing near the court-house, were materially injured by cold shot fired from the fort. They therefore report a bill for his relief.

GEORGIA MILITIA.

Mr. TELFAIR, from the committee appointed on the petition of Jonas Fauche, who were instructed by resolution of the House to inquire into the claims of certain detachments of the militia of Georgia, for services performed during the year 1793 and 1794, by order of the Executive of that State, under a discretionary power communicated by the War Department, made a detailed report on the said claims; which was read; when Mr. T. reported a bill to authorize the payment of certain militia claims of the State of Georgia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The report is as follows:

That the first object which suggested itself for inquiry was, Whether the Governor of Georgia had indeed been vested with a discretionary power to call out any portion of the militia of that State to serve at the expense of the Union? And though, in answer to their inquiry, they learned that all the correspondence relating to this point on the files of the War Department had been consumed, still, from the documents accompanying the report to this House from that Department, dated 3d February, 1803, they are satisfied that such a power was communicated to the Governor by a letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date 27th October, 1792, in which he says: "If the information which you may receive shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof as may be in your power, and which the occasion may require;" that this power was not finally withdrawn until a letter was received from the Secretary, of the 19th July, 1793, though it had been suspended for the short period of ten days, viz: from the 30th of May to the 10th June; that the letter of the 30th of May, which limited the Governor to the employment of one hundred horse and one hundred foot, was written in consequence of an impression at the Seat of the General Government that our Indian affairs had assumed a more pacific aspect, but was countermanded, and the discretionary power restored by that of the 10th June, in consequence of information in the interim received of the State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, which induced the Secretary to say: "The measure taken by your Excellency may be considered as indispensable. You are the judge of the degree of danger, and of its duration, and will, undoubtedly, proportion the defence to the exigencies."

Hence arose a second inquiry: Whether the Governor had exercised the powers vested in him with a due degree of caution, by adapting the means to the end, by proportioning the force to the degree of danger to which the State was exposed? This investigation was so embarrassed by the multitude of considerations involved, by the remoteness of the period, and by other combination of circumstances, that your committee cannot pretend to have arrived at any satisfactory result, and, indeed, it is doubtful if any rule could be prescribed by which the force to be employed shall be so graduated by the danger impending as to make concurrent the estimates of those immediately exposed with others remote from the scene of aggression; hence, if a discretionary power is given to the Executive of a State to employ the militia at the expense of the General Government, that excess should indeed be great which deprives the soldier of his hard-earned pay. And when it is recollected that the then frontiers of Georgia were upwards of four hundred miles; that it was thinly inhabited; that it was bordered by a most warlike tribe of Indians, arrayed in deadly hostility, your committee cannot object to the force employed, even if that amount were twelve hundred men, which is the maximum of force stated to have been in service at any one period during the year 1793. The committee, then, are of opinion that the Governor of Georgia was vested with a discretionary power to call out such force as the exigencies might seem to him to require; and they have not found any just or reasonable objection to the extent of force employed; consequently, they believe the United States bound to discharge the expenses incurred, because in them are reposed the duties and attributes of defence.

The only remaining question to which the inquiry of the committee has been directed, was, How long a time after the receipt of the letter of the 19th of July should be allowed to effect a disbandment of troops employed? And here they are left again without any certain lights or satisfactory data other than the opinions of Colonel Freeman, who then acted as agent of the War Department, and General Dearborn, who made report to Congress upon these claims; both of whom seem to concur in opinion that the extent of country over which they were spread could not admit of an earlier disbandment than the 1st of September, 1793, if, indeed, so soon. The committee further coincide in opinion with the Secretary, just cited, that less injustice would result from an admission of the claims up to the end of the year 1793, than would arise from the rejection of those of the last three months. They therefore recommend the adoption of a bill appropriating $95,971 23, in payment of those claims for militia service in the State of Georgia, for which pay and muster-rolls have been received up to the end of the year 1793.

CAPTIVES BY THE INDIANS.

Mr. COMSTOCK rose to offer a resolution. He said he had sometimes been called upon, in the discharge of professional obligation, to probe those wounds, and to cause them to bleed afresh, which were partially healed. It was now his painful duty to advert to transactions, which exhibited the human character in an amiable and honorable aspect, and in vile and horrid deformity. The history of the battle of the river Raisin, said he, fought under the command of the brave but unfortunate Gen. Winchester, has been read by this House and this nation, with too much interest and sensibility to have been forgotten. It discloses events which incessantly awaken our sympathy and regret for the unhappy fate of many of our beloved fellow-citizens, and which excite our abhorrence and detestation of the base and perfidious conduct of General Proctor, who commanded the combined force of British and Indians, with which our troops had to contend on that memorable occasion. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the names of Allen, Hart, Graves, and Simpson, with many of their virtuous companions in arms, will live in the esteem and affection of mankind, and their catastrophe be deplored, whilst the name of Proctor, branded with eternal infamy, will only survive to be the scorn and derision of the world. Far be it from me, sir, to cherish a sentiment of unforgiving hostility towards any of those British officers or soldiers who have waged the recent contest against us, with a due regard to the principles and usages of civilized warfare. Among these, sir, doubtless were many examples of brave, humane, and honorable men. But surely the generous Briton must blush and feel humiliated at the recollection, that the same country which gave birth to a Sidney, a Russell, a Chatham, and a Howard, should also have produced a Proctor. Whilst the heart sickens over the consideration of his murderous malignity, it is torn with anguish from the remembrance of its direful consequences. It is known, sir, that in January, 1813, Frenchtown and its contiguous settlements were menaced by a savage foe. The inhabitants manifested their fearful apprehensions, and solicited from our army aid and protection. General Winchester, with a force of about seven hundred and fifty men, chiefly volunteers from the State of Kentucky, among whom were many of her most favorite sons, promptly repaired to this quarter, to defend the inhabitants from that promiscuous carnage in which this species of enemy usually indulge. That, on the 22d day of the month, above 1,000 British and Indians, the latter headed by Roundhead and Splitlog, and all under the command of General Proctor, attacked this Spartan band. They successfully repelled, for a considerable time, the furious assaults of the enemy; and nobly sustained the honor of the country in the unequal conflict. But, sir, the most wise and gallant efforts, whilst they challenge our admiration, are not always crowned with success.

Terrors and fair promises were held out by General Proctor to our troops. They were told by him that, in case they did not surrender, he could not be responsible for the conduct of the Indians, and that Frenchtown would be burned. They were, moreover, promised by him, that, if they would surrender, they should not be murdered; that they should not be rifled of their private effects, and that the officers should have their side arms returned, and, under these delusive promises, they did surrender; and with what faith these engagements were regarded is too well known. Here we have an awful manifestation of the deplorable ruins of the fall, and another distressing proof of the wretched depravity of man. The surviving prisoners were put under the charge of Indians, to be marched to Malden. But few ever arrived at the place of destination; many were wantonly massacred on the way, and others carried off by the Indians, and made the degraded objects of an abominable traffic.

The houses containing the sick and wounded were burned, and the rights of sepulture, from an affected fear of offending the Indians, were refused to our slaughtered citizens. This last act of friendship and of duty was, however, performed to some, in the face of every peril, by the humane inhabitants of this ill-fated region. I have said, sir, that many of our captive citizens were made the degraded objects of an abominable traffic. Yes, sir, Americans, our brethren, rendered dear to us by a thousand sacred ties, were publicly hawked about the roads and streets, to gratify the cupidity, or afford the means of indulging the beastly appetites of their savage masters. In view of the complicated misery our troops were suffering, and would continue to endure in barbarian captivity, the citizens in and about Detroit, obeying the voice of humanity, and the dictates of benevolent feelings, purchased numbers of them from the Indians. Some of the inhabitants who engaged in this laudable work, are, I understand, in limited circumstances, and stand in need of being remunerated for these expenditures. The ladies, ever pre-eminent in acts of kindness and charity, displayed the distinguishing perfections of their character upon this mournful occasion. They cheerfully parted with their personal ornaments, and with many articles of clothing, to redeem from the most deplorable slavery their brave but unfortunate defenders. In thus purchasing redemption, sir, for our captives, the inhabitants anticipated the Government in the discharge of an imperious duty, which it certainly would have performed. Sound policy, which is always founded in justice, demands that the Government should indemnify the class of citizens of which I have spoken. It cannot wish them longer to sustain those losses, which ought to be borne by the nation. It is proper to mention, sir, upon this subject, what I am informed has lately been ascertained, that even at this moment one of our citizens, taken prisoner at the river Raisin, is held in cruel bondage by an Indian in the upper province of Canada.

Sir, I cannot suppress the effusions of my sensibility, when I reflect on the various and aggravated evils which those of certain portions of our frontier have suffered in the course of the late war. Legislate as far as you can, with a view to their alleviation, and they will have eventually sustained its calamities in an undue proportion, with those of the interior. Under these impressions, sir, I indulge a hope that the resolution may be adopted, and that the important subject it involves may be prosecuted to an honorable and beneficial result.

Mr. C. then moved the following resolution :

"Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to remunerate those who, in the late war, redeemed (by purchase) our captive officers and soldiers from the Indians, and of making such provision as may be deemed expedient, to redeem those now in captivity."

Mr. HARRISON said, he hoped this resolution would be adopted, and the latter clause particularly, on account of information of an important character which had come to his knowledge. He had learned, he said, from a respectable source, that a citizen of ours was at this moment held in captivity by an Indian in the city of Quebec, the capital of the province of Lower Canada, where the Governor General of all the possessions of His Britannic Majesty in Canada resides. Mr. H. said he had been in doubt whether to give credit to a tale so improbable, as that a citizen of the United States, whom the British Government was bound by treaty to release and deliver up, should yet be retained in captivity. He had to read again and again, the letter he had received from a lawyer of high standing in Lexington, who had assured him he was well acquainted with the person who had given him the information, that a certain man by the name of Fant, or Fants, a drummer in Captain Hart's company, (whom Gen. H. said he well remembered,) was hired out in Quebec by an Indian, for the benefit of his pocket. It was impossible that the circumstance should exist, and the fact should not before this have reached the ears of British officers there. He hoped the resolution would be adopted, and that the President of the United States would take proper measures to represent that circumstance in its proper light to the British Government.

The resolution was adopted without debate or opposition.

REVOLUTIONARY HISTORY.

The resolution from the Senate to authorize the President of the United States to employ Colonel John Trumbull to compose and execute four paintings of the principal events of the Revolutionary contest, (to be placed in the Capitol,) was taken up, and ordered to be read a third time, without opposition.

The resolution was accordingly read a third time, and, on the question of its passage, a debate arose, interesting, amusing, and instructive. The general features of the debate must suffice.

The object of the resolution was opposed by Messrs. FORSYTH, ROSS, ROBERTSON, TAYLOR of New York, and HARDIN; and advocated by Messrs. CALHOUN, WRIGHT, HOPKINSON, HARRISON, RANDOLPH, H. NELSON, and GROSVENOR.

The talents of the artist were acknowledged on all hands, and the excellence of those paintings, exhibited as the models from which the large paintings are to be taken, was generally admitted.

But, in opposition to the resolution a variety of arguments were urged by different gentlemen, such as, that it was questionable how far it was just or proper for the Government of the United States to become the patron of the fine arts; that, if it were to do so, no such expense ought to be authorized until the faith of the Government was redeemed by the fulfilment of all its pecuniary obligations, nor until every debt was paid arising out of the war of the Revolution, or of the late war; that a nation, like individuals, should be just before it was generous; that the subjects of the paintings not being particularized, they might not be such as Congress would approve; that to authorize these paintings, for the decoration of the Capitol, before it was known whether they could be properly displayed there, would be, to act like the Vicar of Wakefield's family, who were grouped in a picture so large, that, when it was brought home, the house would not hold it; that, generally, in the countries where they had been brought to the highest perfection, paintings and statuary, in commemoration of liberty and of great events, had no perceptible effect in preserving the liberty and independence of those nations; and the rights and liberties of this nation depended on no such paltry considerations as these.

In reply to which it was argued, that it was not proposed by this resolve to make the Government the patron of the fine arts, otherwise than it had already been in employing artists to rebuild and embellish the Capitol; that the expense would be small comparatively with expenses incurred in decorations of infinitely less importance, and small indeed compared with the magnitude of the object; that the Government had performed its obligations as far as it could, had paid its debts, had been just, and might therefore be generous, since generosity and justice were not incompatible; that the moral effect of these paintings would be, independent of their intrinsic worth, of great value to the present and future generations, serving to recall to the attention of future legislators the events and principles of the Revolution, and to impel them to an imitation of the virtues of the men of those days; that the time now was, which once passed away could never be regained, when a living artist of great ability, and a compatriot of the Revolutionary sages and heroes, could transmit accurate likenesses of them to posterity, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution.—Negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, then moved to recommit the resolution, with instructions to report a limitation to the expenditure of money for this object. This motion was also negatived.

The question on the passage of the resolution, was, after a long debate, decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 50, as follows:

So the resolution was passed.

BILL FOR ENFORCING NEUTRALITY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill more effectually to restrain our citizens from enterprises against nations in amity with the United States—the question still being on striking out the third section of the bill.

Mr. ROOR delivered a speech of considerable length in favor of the motion, and expressed his views of the question very much at large. Not only this bill proposed to go too far, but the acts already existing, he contended, went too far. He avowed, in the strongest terms, his disposition to recognise the independence of the Spanish provinces, and hoped the Government would acknowledge their Minister, Mr. Thompson, &c. He denounced the provisions of the third section, as not only tyrannical but unnecessary, in the strongest terms. If our citizens did commit acts of hostility against Spain, our Government had only to disavow any agency in the acts, and there would be a fair offset to the affair of the Firebrand; for, in such matters, in diplomatic etiquette, it seemed, the word of one nation must be taken for the fact by another. He was not only opposed to this bill entirely, but he wished to God he could read from the statute book the act of 1797, which he considered as infringing the spirit of the Constitution, &c.

Mr. BARBOUR, after an argument at length to prove that the Government ought not to extend its inhibitions to the citizens and subjects of another State who might purchase vessels from our citizens, and that so to do was not necessary to the most sincere disposition to carry into effect our neutral obligations, moved an amendment to the third section, calculated to reconcile it to his view in this respect; which, after a few remarks in reply by Mr. FORSYTH, was agreed to.

The question was then taken on striking out the third section of the bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized and directed to detain any vessel bound from the United States, of which the cargo shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war, when the number of men shipped on board or other circumstances shall render it probable that there is an intention to violate the neutral obligations of the United States, to foreign Governments, until the decision of the President be had thereupon, or until the owner enters into bond and security to the collector prior to clearing out the same, in double the amount of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed by the owner or owners in cruising or committing hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property, of any Prince or State, with whom the United States are at peace.

And on the question—"Shall this section be stricken out?" it was determined in the negative—yeas 37, nays 98, as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Birdsall, Blount, Brooks, Caldwell, Cannon, Carr of Massachusetts, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Comstock, Conduct, Conner, Cook, Desha, Gold, Hammond, Hooks, Ingham, Johnson of Virginia, Kerr of Virginia, Lyle, Lyon, Parris, Robertson, Root, Ross, Savage, Scheuck, Sharp, Wallace, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilkin, Willoughby, Wright, Yancey, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Betts, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brown, Burwell, Cady, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Clendennin, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Darlington, Davenport, Dickens, Edwards, Fletcher, Forsyth, Gaston, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hahn, Hale, Hall, Hardin, Harrison, Heister, Hendricks, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hungerford, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, King, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Little, Lowndes, William Maclay, William P. A motion was made by Mr. FORSYTH, to amend the second section of the bill, by striking out of the seventh line, the word "either" and from the word "owners" in the same line, to the word "in" in the ninth line, conforming the condition of the bond required by that section, to that required by the third section amended as aforesaid.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 28.

Mr. EDWARDS presented a petition of Lavinia Hawkins, widow of Benjamin Hawkins, late agent for Indian affairs in the Creek nation,

JANUARY, 1817.

H. OF R.

praying for a confirmation of the grant of the lands granted by the said Creek Indians to the said Benjamin Hawkins, his wife and children, at the treaty concluded with them by General Jackson on the 9th of August, 1814.—Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HARRISON presented petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, praying that certain lands in said State ceded to the United States by the Indians, at the Treaty of Greenville, and reserved, may be sold on the terms and conditions on which other public lands of the United States are sold.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on that part of the estimates for the military service for the year 1817, which relates to the charge produced by brevet commissions; which was read; when Mr. L. reported a bill respecting the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, also reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1817; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill making appropriations for support of the Government for the year 1817.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Jesse Hunt, who prays for the remission of certain duties payable to the United States, by reason of the destruction by fire of the said goods, on their voyage in the steamboat. This report was earnestly opposed by Mr. HARRISON, on the principle that the Government ought not to demand a tax or duty from any man, who, without his own agency, had become unable to pay it; and it was supported by Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, on the ground of the established practice of the Government to insist on the payment of duties in all cases whatsoever. The report was concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the petition of John Bate, reported a bill for the relief of John Bate; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOSELEY, from the committee appointed on the petition of Andrew Law, reported a bill to extend the patent granted to Andrew Law for an improvement in the mode of printing music; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GASTON, from the select committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of North Carolina, respecting unsettled claims to lands on North Carolina grants, &c., delivered in a detailed report on the subject, introductory to a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described," &c.; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GASTON also made an unfavorable report on the petition of certain citizens of Blount county, Tennessee, respecting public lands; which was read, and concurred in.

The bill from the Senate "authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin," was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

BILL FOR ENFORCING NEUTRALITY.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day on the bill to repress private expeditions for warlike purposes, against Powers in amity with the United States. The question depending yesterday on the amendment proposed by Mr. FORSYTH to the second section recurred: When the said section was read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the owners of all armed ships, sailing out of the ports of the United States, and owned wholly or in part by citizens thereof, shall enter into bond to the collector, with sufficient security, prior to the clearing out the same, in double the amount of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed either by the owners or by any person to whom they may sell, or pretend to sell the same, in cruising or committing hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any Power, or State, with whom the United States are at peace.

A motion was made by Mr. DICKENS to extend the amendment of Mr. FORSYTH, so as to embrace "by the owners," which motion was rejected by the House.

The amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. FORSYTH, to the said second section, was then agreed to by the House.

The first section of the said bill is in the following words:

SEC. 1. Be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States shall, within the limits of the same, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly aid or be concerned in the fitting out and arming any private ship or vessel of war, or sell the said vessel, or contract for the sale of the said vessel to be delivered in the United States, or elsewhere, to the purchaser, with intent or previous knowledge that the said vessel shall, or will be employed to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property, of any Prince or State with whom the United States are at peace, such persons so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding ten years; and the trial of such offence shall either be in the district of the United States, wherein the vessel was fitted out and armed, or in that wherein the contract of sale was made.

A motion was made by Mr. CALHOUN to amend the said section, by striking out the words "or elsewhere."—Negatived.

Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the fourth section by inserting after the word "vessel" where it first occurs, the words "owned by a belligerent," and after the word vessel where it occurs the second time, the words "owned as aforesaid."—Negatived.

Mr. INGHAM moved to strike out the word "ten" between the words "exceeding" and "dollars" in the first section, and in lieu thereof to insert the word "five;" which motion was rejected by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. ROSS to strike out from the second section the word "double;" which motion was also rejected.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to amend the third section, by striking out the word "principally," and in lieu thereof, to insert "in whole or in part."—Negatived.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to add to the bill, the following section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That any ship or vessel sailing out of the United States, under the license of any foreign Minister, shall be liable to confiscation and condemnation to the use of the United States.

And on the question, "Shall this section be added to the bill?" it was determined in the negative.

The bill being further amended, the question was then taken, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 60, as follows:

A Bill to prevent citizens of the United States from selling vessels of war to the citizens or subjects of any foreign Power, and more effectually to prevent the arming and equipping vessels of war in the ports of the United States, intended to be used against nations in amity with the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That if any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly aid or be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming any private ship or vessel of war, or sell the said vessel, or contract for the sale of the said vessel, to be delivered in the United States, or elsewhere, to the purchaser, with intent or previous knowledge that the said vessel shall or will be employed to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any Prince or State, or of any colony, district or people with whom the United States are at peace, such person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding ten years; and the trial of such offence shall either be in the district of the United States wherein the vessel was fitted out and armed, or in that wherein the contract of sale was made.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the owners of all armed ships, sailing out of the ports of the United States, and owned wholly or in part by citizens thereof, shall enter into bond to the collector, with sufficient security, prior to clearing out the same, in double the amount of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed by the owners in cruising or committing hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any Prince or State, or of any colony, district or people, with whom the United States are at peace.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized and required to detain any vessel bound from the United States, of which the cargo shall principally consist of arms and munitions of war, when the number of men shipped on board, or other circumstances, shall render it probable there is an intention to violate the neutral obligations of the United States to foreign Governments, until the decision of the President be had thereupon, or until the owner enters into bond and security to the collector, prior to the clearing out the same, in double the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo on board, including her armament, that the said ship or vessel shall not be employed by the owner or owners in cruising or committing hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any Prince or State, colony, district or people with whom the United States are at peace.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no foreign ship or vessel shall be armed and equipped, nor shall the force of any foreign armed ship or vessel be increased or augmented in the ports of the United States, under any pretext whatsoever.

shire Association for the Promotion of Agriculture and Manufactures in Massachusetts, praying that the aid of the National Government may be extended to the promotion of the interests of agriculture and manufactures, either by the establishment of a national board, or by such other measures as in the wisdom of Congress may seem meet and proper; which petition was ordered to be referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HULBERT, GOLD, PLEASANTS, TELFAIR, and W. P. MACLAY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a petition of the American Society for the Encouragement of Domestic Manufactures, representing the depressed and distressed condition of the manufacturing establishments throughout the United States, and praying that the duties imposed by the new tariff may be made permanent—that the importation of cotton manufactures from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope may be prohibited—that further and more efficient provisions may be adopted to prevent smuggling, false invoices, and other frauds on the revenue—that a duty of ten per cent. be laid on auction sales of foreign goods—and that such additional aid and protection may be extended to them generally, as will place them beyond that foreign influence which aims at their destruction.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of the second convention of the Manumission Society of Tennessee, praying that the objects of their association may be taken into the serious consideration of Congress, and that such aid may be afforded to them as may be within the Constitutional powers of the General Government; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of Robert Burnside; which was read, when Mr. L. reported a bill for the relief of Robert Burnside; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the same committee, which were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to satisfy the claims of the friendly Creek Indians, whose property was plundered by the hostile Creeks, in consequence of their attachment to the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, when Mr. L. reported a bill for the relief of certain Creek Indians; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, made a report on the petition of William Miller, and others; which was read, when Mr. R. reported a bill, confirming the title of Miller and Futton to a tract of land on the Bayou Boeuf, in the State of Louisiana; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the location of the lands reserved by treaty to certain chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians.

Mr. SHARP, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Daniel; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the same committee, also reported a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

BILL FOR ENFORCING NEUTRALITY.

The engrossed bill to prohibit the sale of armed vessels, to be used against friendly Powers, &c., was read the third time, and passed—ayes 83, noes 62.

The title was amended, so as to entitle it "An act more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States."

THE NAVIGATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to regulate the navigation of the United States. [To prohibit, after a certain day, the importation of any merchandise from any foreign port, except in vessels of the United States, or in foreign vessels owned wholly by the citizens or subjects of the country of which the goods are the growth or produce, or from which such goods, &c., are usually shipped for transportation: Provided, That the prohibition shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, or shall not adopt a similar regulation.]

Mr. FORSYTH explained the views of the committee in reporting the bill; its effects, and the necessity of such a regulation, to place our navigation on a footing with, and countervail the partial regulation of foreign countries.

Mr. LOWNDES moved to strike out of the bill the proviso stated above. This motion produced an interesting debate on the principles of the bill, in which the commercial intercourse of this country with foreign nations, the relation of trade generally, and the effect of our commercial conventions, &c., were widely discussed. The gentlemen who took a leading part in the discussion were, Messrs. LOWNDES, FORSYTH, SMITH, of Maryland, CALHOUN, CLAY, HOPKINSON, and PITKIN.

On taking the question on striking out the proviso, it was decided in the negative—ayes 36.

No other amendment being offered, the Committee proceeded to take up the next bill referred to it, being the bill to prohibit all commercial intercourse with those ports into which the vessels of the United States are not permitted to enter and trade.

After spending some time in assiduously discussing the provisions of this bill, and various propositions to amend them, the Committee rose and reported the first bill to the House, and obtained leave to sit again on the latter one, and the House adjourned.

Mr. FORSYTH presented a petition of the Columbian Institute, for the promotion of the arts and sciences, praying for a grant of a portion of the public ground within the City of Washington, known on the plat of the said city by the name of the Mall, to enable the said Institute to establish a botanical garden, and to carry into effect the other objects of their association.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting the bounty of 160 acres of land to all the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the Army, who, having been enlisted previously to the 24th of December, 1811, are not entitled, under existing laws, to said bounty, but who have faithfully served to the close of the late war, and obtained an honorable discharge.

The bill concerning the navigation of the United States, was ordered to be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole, to which has been referred the bill to prohibit all commercial intercourse with the ports or places into, or with which the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade.

Mr. JACKSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

"Resolved, That there shall be appointed by the Speaker, for the present session, and at the commencement of each ensuing session of Congress, three clerks of committees, to be assigned to such standing committees as he may designate, with such daily compensation during the sessions as he shall prescribe, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives."

MISSOURI TERRITORY.

Mr. POPE offered for consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting or securing to the town of St. Louis, in the Missouri Territory, as a common, all the sand bar, or baturo, formed by the recession of the Mississippi river between the said town and low water mark, and to prohibit the location of any floating claim in the said Territory thereon; or, if any location should have been made, to prohibit, by law, the issuing of a patent therefor."

"Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the location of any floating claim on any lands in the Territory of Missouri, the right of pre-emption to which land has been secured to any settler by the act of the 12th of April, 1814; or, if any such location should have been made, to prohibit, by law, the issuing of a patent therefor."

"Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the location of any floating claim in the Territory of Missouri, on any lands, the right, title, or claim to which has been at any time heretofore given notice of, or filed with either of the boards of commissioners in said Territory, or with the recorder of land titles, acting as such under any law of Congress for the adjustment of land titles in said Territory; or, if any such location should have been made, to prohibit, by law, the issuing of patents therefor."

"Resolved, also, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, the location of any floating claim in the Territory of Missouri, on any town lot, village lot, out lot, or common field lot, or commons, in, adjoining or appertaining to any of the towns or villages in the Territory of Missouri; or, if any such location should have been made, to prohibit, by law, the issuing of patents therefor."

Mr. POPE explained the objects of these resolutions. In regard to the first he said, that, under the law passed at a former session, (authorizing the transfer of land claims from the county of New Madrid to other vacant lands in the Missouri Territory,) an attempt had been made to appropriate a piece of land usually called baturo, between high and low water mark, the possession of which, in this manner obtained, would probably be extremely detrimental to the town of St. Louis, subjecting its prosperity to the will of the owner of that property. In regard to the second, it was predicated on the injustice of permitting pre-emption claims (already recognised by law) from being covered by other patents, &c. With respect to the third, he said that involved a matter of more difficulty. The act of Congress for the settlement of land claims in the Missouri Territory made the decisions of the commissioners thereon final, when the claims should be favorably adjudged; when otherwise, the decisions were not final, but were referred by the act to the decision of Congress, in respect to the question between the United States and the claimants, Congress not having yet legislated on the subject, the claims yet stood against the Government; and as in some cases the claims had been improperly rejected by the commissioners, it would not be proper to permit those who obtained the bounty of Government, to locate their grants in such a manner as to deprive such individuals of their rights. The fourth regarded town lots, which it would be injudicious and unfair to suffer individuals to locate claims on, &c.

The resolutions were adopted without objection.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to prohibit all commercial intercourse with ports or places into, or with which the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade."

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, observed that it was only necessary to suggest to the Committee the great importance of the subject under discussion to insure to it all the attention it demanded. It was not a subject that respected particular sections of the country, but it had a direct bearing upon our national prosperity and national defence. Commerce and navigation were indeed indivisible, and their intimate connexion with the agricultural and manufacturing interest was known to all. The regulations proposed by the bill bore no analogy to the restrictive system, commencing with the non-importation act of 1806, and ending in war in 1812; that was not to regulate commerce, but to convert it into an engine of war, which reacted with greater force upon our citizens than it acted upon our enemy. The present regulations, if adopted, would be in self-defence, to retaliate upon foreign nations some of their injurious impositions. It never had been the policy of this country to begin a system of this kind, but it is her true policy to countervail the regulations of other nations. An honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who does not appear to have examined this subject with his usual accuracy and precision, in the few observations he submitted yesterday, thinks that regulations of the kind contemplated by this bill ought to be the subject of compact or treaty: why then is the power to regulate commerce vested in Congress? Especially if the doctrine contended for by some honorable gentlemen be correct, as in the case of the late commercial convention with Great Britain, that the sanction of Congress is not necessary to the validity of such a convention? But, sir, it requires the consent of two nations to form a treaty, though we may pass laws regulating commerce. And such laws are infinitely more permanent than treaties. Take the case of Great Britain in relation to her celebrated navigation act; which has now existed for more than one hundred and fifty years. How often have her treaties, within that time, been renewed, with the principal nations of Europe! Laws thus passed, thus permanent, are not liable to be torn asunder by every blast of war. But, sir, we have no option left—some of the nations of Europe, one at least, has established her regulations, injurious as we think to our navigation, and refuses to treat on the subject; nor will she ever treat thereon, if you thus acquiesce. A free and fair commerce with all the world is what we wish—an absence of all restrictions; but if other nations will not pursue this course, we must retaliate, or sacrifice the best interests of the country.

I wish, sir, to draw the attention of the Committee to the language and opinions of some of our most distinguished statesmen on this subject. In 1784, the report of a committee of Congress under the Confederation—two of which committee were Mr. Jefferson and the late Vice President, Mr. Gerry—contains these paragraphs:

“The trust reposed in Congress renders it their duty to be attentive to the conduct of foreign nations, and to prevent or restrain, as far as may be, all such proceedings as might prove injurious to the United States. The situation of commerce at this time claims the attention of the several States, and few objects of greater importance can present themselves to their notice. The fortune of every citizen is interested in the success thereof; for it is the constant source of wealth and incentive to industry; and the value of our produce and our land must ever rise or fall in proportion to the prosperous or adverse state of trade.

“Already has Great Britain adopted regulations destructive of our commerce with her West India islands. There was reason to expect that measures so unequal, and so little calculated to promote mercantile intercourse, would not be persevered in by an enlightened nation. But these measures are growing into system.”

Another committee of that honorable body in 1785—Colonel Monroe, the President elect, was one—in a letter to the States, says:

“Possessing no advantages in the ports of his own country, and subjected to much higher duties and restrictions in those of other Powers, it will necessarily become the interest of the American merchant to ship his produce in foreign bottoms; of course their prospects of national consequence must decline, their merchants become only the agents and retailers of those of foreign Powers, their extensive forests be hewn down and laid waste, to add to their strength and national resources, and the American flag be rarely seen upon the face of the seas.” “If they (the States) wish to cement the Union by the strongest ties of interest and affection; if they wish to promote its strength and grandeur, founded upon that of each individual State, every consideration of local as well as of Federal policy urge them to adopt the following recommendation:”

To vest Congress with power to regulate commerce. Our present Constitution gave them that power, the use they will make of it, on this subject we are yet to learn.

In 1793, according to a resolution of the House of Representatives, Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, made an able and highly important report, on the privileges and restrictions of our commerce in foreign countries, in which he says:

“Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in exchange either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market. Customers, too, whose demands increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.

“But should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them.

“Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defence, essential.”

How fully was this verified in our late war, by the brilliant achievements of our gallant Navy—so honorable to our country—so glorious to our naval heroes!

“Its value as a branch of industry is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

“But it is as a resource of defence, that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States, leave them nothing to fear on their land-board, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on their sea-board they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected; this can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen, and of artists and establishments in readiness for ship building.

"The carriage of our own commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists, whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defence; and time will not be requisite to raise up others; when disgrace or losses bring home to our feelings the error of having abandoned them. The materials for maintaining our due share of navigation are ours in abundance; and, as the mode of using them, we have only to adopt the principles of those who put us on the defensive, or others equivalent and better fitted to our circumstances.

"Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs.

"Where a nation refuses to receive in our vessels any productions but our own, we may refuse to receive in theirs any but their own productions.

"Where a nation refuses to our vessels the carriage even of our own productions, to certain countries under her dominion, we might refuse to theirs, of every description, carriage of the same productions to the same countries.

"But as justice and good neighborhood would dictate, that those who have no part in imposing the restriction on us, should not be the victims of measures adopted to defeat its effect, it may be proper to confine the restriction to vessels owned or navigated by any subjects of the same dominant Power, other than the inhabitants of the country, to which the said productions are to be carried. And to prevent all inconvenience to the said inhabitants, and to our own, by too sudden a check on the means of transportation, we may continue to admit the vessels marked for future exclusion, on an advanced tonnage, and for such length of time only, as will be supposed necessary, to provide against such inconvenience."

Such, sir, were the opinions and views of some of our most distinguished statesmen, and such were the principles of policy recommended by them, for the adoption of their country—equally applicable to our present situation—equally necessary now to be adopted. That they were not called upon at an earlier period, the convulsed state of Europe, from the commencement of the French revolution, in 1789, to the termination of the late conflict in Europe, furnishes a sufficient reason. But, sir, Congress ought before to have acted upon this subject—before the termination of that conflict—before the negotiation of the late commercial convention of London. Great Britain did this: she revised her navigation laws; formed a new tariff, or greatly altered her former, and adapted the whole to a state of peace in Europe and with America. And although in that convention she professes to put the direct trade between the two countries upon a perfect footing of reciprocity, yet she had before secured the principal advantages to her own ships and subjects. In a word, (and in the words of Mr. Jeferson's report,) we did give "her commerce and navigation in exchange for restrictions and vexations." We admit all her productions; she refuses or lays prohibitory duties on many of ours. All our ports are open to her; one-third of her ports are closed against us. She told our Commissioners we had nothing to offer in exchange for her colonial ports. Have we not a most extensive and lucrative commerce to offer for them—a commerce, if not essential to their existence, at least necessary to their growth and prosperity? Shall it be said we have nothing to offer for the trade of these colonies, when they now receive in British bottoms three-quarters of their supplies from us? No, sir; pass the laws on your table, and at your next negotiation you will have in them stronger arguments than any of your Commissioners had at the formation of the late convention, as it respects the colonial trade. In little more than two years that convention will expire. You will probably treat again upon the subjects embraced by it. These laws will aid you in obtaining a true reciprocity in commerce. All nations disposed to act on high and honorable principles will find America anxious to do the same. If they are disposed to remove all restrictions from commerce, America will do the same. Such is the language of her statesmen, quoted above; such the language of her laws. Unsolicited, she long since passed a law offering to all commercial traders to abolish all discriminating duties, that commerce, like the ocean on which it floats, might find its proper level; that the ocean might indeed become the great, the common, and the safe highway of nations, where the citizens and subjects might meet as friends.

Permit me now, sir, to ask the attention of the Committee to the principal features of the British navigation act. It is a wise and aged monitor; it has existed for more than one hundred and fifty years; the most profitable and best counselor the British monarchy ever possessed. And I sincerely hope that our country will draw much profit and instruction from the same source. The following account of that act, greatly abbreviated, is taken from Chitty's Law of Nations. Some of the additional acts have received modification since he wrote, particularly in relation to this country:

The great navigation act (as it is called) of Great Britain passed before the Restoration, viz: October 9, 1651, and was intended "to cripple the Dutch trade." The subsisting act of navigation was passed 12 Charles II., ch. 18. Its principal provisions are three-fold, viz:

1. Relating to the coasting trade of Great Britain;
2. Her trade with other independent States;
3. The trade she carries on herself, or permits other States to carry on, with her plantations and foreign possessions.

The first is confined solely to British bottoms—the master and three-quarters at least of the seamen English—and is from one port or creek of England, Ireland, &c., to another port or creek in the same.

JANUARY, 1817.

Commercial Intercourse.

H. OF R.

The second is restricted to English vessels, or vessels of the country producing the article—the master and three-quarters of the crew of that country—or to vessels of the place where the article is first shipped. By 6 George I., ch. 15. Timber from Germany confined to English vessels. Certain enumerated articles admitted from Europe. The trade with Asia, Africa, and America, restricted to British colonial vessels of hers, by 12 Charles II., ch. 18. 3. Exceptions in favor of the Portuguese, 48 George III., ch. 11. Products direct from Brazil, in Portuguese vessels, owned by subjects of that Government, resident in said country.

Exception to the United States, 37 George III., ch. 97. American products in American and British ships—the master and three-quarters of the mariners of the country. “Any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, production, or manufacture, of the United States, not prohibited by law,” section 37, this act to continue in force so long as the treaty between His Majesty and the United States shall. The treaty ceased, but this statute was continued, by sundry acts, to 1808; then continued another year; and the 49 George III., ch. 59, re-enacted the same, without any limitation. (Impairance of these legislative acts not repealed by law.) This act then is permanently in force, except when affected for a time by our non-intercourse, embargo, or the British retaliations thereof. Some exceptions from the general law, as to unmanufactured tobacco, indigo, and cochineal. Exceptions and permanent absence of all restrictions as to masts, timber or boards, pitch, tar, rosin, hemp or flax, by 47 George III., ch. 27, 2. May be exported in any vessel belonging to any State in amity with His Majesty, navigated in any manner, (since altered;) also bullion and prize goods, by original act of 12 Charles II., ch. 18, 15; also temporary suspensions during the war. By said original act, the trade of Great Britain with her colonies (which was the third branch above named) is confined to her home and colonial shipping. Exceptions by 45 George III., ch. 57, enacts that wood, cotton, wool, &c., mill timber, horses, cattle, &c., may be imported into certain ports, viz: Kingston, Savannah, La Mar, &c., from the country of their growth, production, or manufacture, in vessels of such country; also tobacco; also permits certain exports, (since altered.) When war is declared, the King, by proclamation, shall permit merchant vessels, &c., to be sailed differently from the navigation laws.

The great object of these laws is to enlarge and strengthen the maritime power of Great Britain; and, as one of her political writers remarks, they impose burdens on foreign to encourage domestic industry; that the act of navigation is, perhaps, the wisest of all the commercial regulations of England. “If the wisdom of any scheme of policy is to be measured by its effects and consequences, our navigation system is entitled to the praise of having attained the end for which it was designed. Whether we regard the primary or inferior objects in this system—whether it is

‘the increase of shipping, the extension of our foreign trade, or the strength of our navy—they have all advanced to a degree of consideration unexampled, and they owe that advancement to this system.’—(Reve’s Law of Shipping, cited in Chitty’s Law of Nations.)

These are some of the features of the celebrated Navigation Act of Great Britain, and of some of the laws relating to the same subject. Let it not be said that she will not relax in her colonial system when we see she has relaxed, even in relation to this country, when it was for her interest. But what reason has she to relax her restrictions if you do not retaliate them? Relax them, did I say! Nay, she will add to them—favor the trade of her own subjects at the expense of your trade, unless you countervail her acts. The very trade between our country and her colonies, which she allows in her own bottoms, is a relaxation of the old colonial law, which restricted that trade to the mother country. And what has been the consequence of this direct trade in British ships between her colonies and this country? That some of these colonies have prevented, by high duties, the introduction from neighboring islands, to which our vessels can go, (except from Bermuda,) of all commodities from this country, because they can receive them cheaper direct from this country, and can send their produce, such I mean as they permit to be sent, chiefly rum, sugar, and molasses, directly to us. And, sir, it is principally by this colonial trade of Great Britain, the decided advantage which that affords, which enables her almost to engross the direct trade between this and Great Britain—the advantage of double voyages: thereby enabling her ship-owners to underbid us in our own ports—(I mean, to carry for less freight.) In relation to that part of Mr. Jefferson’s report which refers to some of the British islands which might equally with ourselves be the victims of the restrictive laws of Great Britain, it is sufficient to remark that some of her colonies, (I do not refer to the islands,) have urged her on to the adoption of some of her laws injurious to our navigation. Nay, some of her colonial assemblies have themselves passed laws in relation to their trade with this country of which we have reason to complain. On the subject of trade in plaster of Paris, the assemblies of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have passed laws of the most offensive character: laying a duty almost equal to the price of the article in the Boston market, on all the plaster exported from their provinces, and landed to the east of Cape Cod—the duty, I think, is twenty shillings sterling the ton; and this act, contrary to all expectation, has received the sanction of the Prince Regent. Thus, to enable the British vessel to carry the article to the place of consumption, a distinction is made in our ports, and a preference given to some of our ports over others. Can Congress for a moment suffer a preference of this kind? Suffer a foreign Power to do that which the Constitution will not permit you to do? Where will these encroachments end, if not met by the most decisive measures of retaliation? Sir, I fear this whole business is a sacrifice of principle to a little temporary interest. We hear it said, it will do no good to pass these laws; Great Britain will not relax in her restrictive laws; sir, it will do this good: it will prevent her wealthy merchants and ship-owners from rising into importance on the misfortunes and the bankruptcies of our citizens; it will prevent her already gigantic naval power from rising still higher on the ruins of our own.

One word more respecting this trade in plaster of Paris. Its importance, and the motives for passing the colonial laws on the subject, may be collected from the resolutions passed "at a meeting of the merchants, ship-owners, and other inhabitants of the city of St. John's, New Brunswick, on the 19th February, 1816"—they say, "That, by the best estimate, this trade, duly regulated, will employ 15,000 tons of additional British shipping, being more than is used in all the rest of the trade of the province."

"That the contraband trade between the ports of the Bay of Fundy and the United States of America, has been baneful to the prosperity of the country, not only by the introduction of illegal merchandise, but by its ruinous drain of specie from it."

"That another prominent evil arising out of this trade is, that a great portion of the numerous vessels belonging to the out-ports of the Bay of Fundy, are only nominally British, but virtually American bottoms," &c.

After other observations, and after adverting to the interest which their "sister province of Nova Scotia" had in this trade, they resolved,

"That a petition to the Legislature of this province, now in session, be immediately forwarded, expressive of the substance of the foregoing resolutions, and humbly praying that effectual regulations be enacted, to the end, that no plaster of Paris may be delivered in the neighborhood of the American lines, or anywhere to the eastward of Boston, in such way as to enable the American coasting vessels to carry it from the said lines to the places of consumption."

Hence, the plaster law above mentioned; but, as Boston must be the victim when anything like a port bill is in agitation, no plaster, by the act, can be delivered east of Cape Cod, without paying the prohibitory duty.

I will now, sir, for a moment, take a view of the navigation of this country; and of its importance not only to the individuals who may own its tonnage, not to that part of the country where the principal part is constructed, but to the nation at large, in relation to the hands and materials employed in its construction, the amount and value of the tonnage, and, above all, in a national point of view, for manning our navy in case of war, with the number of seamen required to navigate it. The amount of our tonnage in 1816, as stated in the Treasury report, was over 1,400,000 tons; but this is presumed to be, by the author (a member of this House, Mr. PIRKIN,) of a statistical view of our commerce, (a work distinguished for accuracy of research and correctness of remark,) greater than the actual amount, which he states at 1,250,000 tons; by the Treasury statement of the amount of tonnage for 1815, laid on our tables yesterday, there were 1,368,127 tons; but the actual amount for that year may be rated at 1,250,000 tons: allowing one seaman for every twenty tons, which is rather under than over the usual proportion, it would require 62,500 seamen to navigate this tonnage, if generally employed. The original cost of this tonnage, on an average of forty dollars the ton, is $50,000,000: the actual value, at any given period, will be found by deducting one-third of the original cost; this will give you an actual capital employed in navigation, for 1815, of thirty-three millions and a third of dollars. The whole of this tonnage requires to be replaced once in ten years, in consequence of loss and decay. There must, therefore, be annually built 125,000 tons, equal in value to $5,000,000, which give employment to more than 10,000 artists and laborers in the construction. This appears a fair estimate from the amount of tonnage actually built in this country when commerce and navigation flourished, say in 1805-6. Ships of war in England, built in the King's docks, of the materials there generally used, are now estimated to last fifteen years; those built in the merchants' yards, ten years: giving an average of twelve years and a half; our merchant vessels may, therefore, be estimated to last ten years. The trade of ship building is extremely important in certain parts of our country not so highly favored as other portions of it, as to soil and climate; taken in connexion with the employment of the ships, it is essential to their prosperity; nay, their population must greatly decrease without this employment. The people of this country formed the Constitution of the United States, among other things, "to promote the general welfare;" is not this done by promoting the welfare of every part? If the people of any part suffer peculiar privations and losses by the injurious acts of foreign nations, and it is in the power of this Government to prevent them in future, is it not its duty to do it? The bill on your table will, it is presumed, remedy some of the evils inflicted on this country, by the restrictive laws of foreign nations.

But, to return to the subject of our navigation; consider the number and variety of persons employed in the construction of a ship—take a ship of two or three hundred tons. A gang of ten or fifteen men are first employed about a month in cutting timber; a different set of men are then employed, with their teams, in hauling it to the ship yard; ten or fifteen carpenters are then employed for two or three months in building the vessel; before she is launched, a different set of men, the caulkers, perform their part; after being launched, the cordage having been manufactured, the riggers fit and put over head the rigging; and the blockmakers, sailmakers, and blacksmiths, furnish their several parts; so down to the pauper who picks the oakum that is driven into her seams. She is then ready to receive on board those enterprising and gallant seamen, who, in the merchant's employ, carry the products of our country to the most distant nations, and, in our naval service, have spread their own glory and the fame of their country through the world.

But what is the situation of our navigation, and of our gallant seamen, at this moment? Owing in part to the causes to which I have alluded, the restrictions imposed by one nation, at least upon our mercantile enterprise, and the many privileges and advantages which the ships and seamen of that very nation enjoy in our ports, in reference to their colonial trade, and even to the direct trade with Great Britain, and in some degree, no doubt, to the general peace throughout the country; more than one-half of our tonnage is now useless—dismantled at the wharves, and literally rotting at the docks. Many of our seamen are reluctantly compelled to seek employ in foreign countries, and to sail under foreign flags. Our ship carpenters, too, destitute of employ, are obliged, for a living, to go into the British Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, there to cut timber, even for the royal navy of England, and to build vessels to carry it to Great Britain. Thus, British merchants, with British capital, employ our carpenters to build many vessels which are not only employed to carry on the direct trade with Great Britain, but to carry our lumber, our live stock, and our provisions, to their colonies. Hundreds of our artists and laborers, formerly employed in ship building, are reduced to poverty, and the owners of our ships, there being neither sale nor employment for them, are, many of them, bankrupt, without even the last consolation of unfortunate merchants, a bankrupt law to save them from prison, and many of our towns and villages, once flourishing by commerce and navigation, deprived of both, now rapidly decay. Will the bill on your table have a tendency to relieve some of these misfortunes? I think it will. If it should not open the British islands to us, it will at least employ many of our ships and seamen to carry some of our productions, necessary for the British islands, to other islands in the West Indies, to be carried thence in British ships into their own ports; giving us the privilege of carrying, nearly to the port of consumption, many of those articles which now are only carried in British vessels. It will, too, prevent some of their merchants, and some portion of their navigation, from flourishing on the ruin of our own. But we have every reason to suppose that, by a measure of this kind, we shall render the British Government a little more inclined, because it will be for her interest, in any future negotiation, to allow us a participation in the trade with many of her islands, equally beneficial to them and ourselves. The bill on your table must have an injurious effect upon the trade of those islands. Although the plantations are in the West Indies, many of their owners are in England, and there form a numerous and wealthy class of subjects. Their complaints, at least, will be attended to by the British Cabinet. Far be it from me, sir, to wish to inflict any suffering on the British colonies; their commerce, like our own, is too often sacrificed to the interest of the parent country; and the measure proposed, if it produces the desired effect, will be equally beneficial to the islands and to this country.

Some inconveniences of a temporary nature may result from the adoption of the regulation proposed; and it is my sincere desire, as far as in my power, to consider the measure in its most important bearings. It will for a time depress, in our market, the price of those articles which are now carried in British ships to their islands. In the North and East, the value of our lumber will be less; but, if the merchants concerned in that trade can see, that what they may lose in the price of the article will be gained by another and equally deserving class of their fellow-citizens; that, in a national point of light, nothing will be lost, and the measure will tend to equalize the benefits of trade throughout the country, they ought and will be satisfied; in this view, it is a call upon their patriotism, which will not be disregarded. The effect upon the price of the products which we receive from their islands, in British vessels, must be small indeed. Rum, sugar, and molasses, are the principal articles which we thus receive. Their rum we can well dispense with; if there never should be another gallon imported into the country, it would be a favor to the nation. We now receive large quantities of sugar and molasses from the Havana, and some from other islands than British; we formerly received considerable quantities of sugar from the East Indies and South America—(Brazil); we now obtain considerable quantities from the Southern portion of the United States, and with suitable encouragement, a great proportion of our whole consumption could be obtained from that source.

It has been pretended by some, that the trade now carried on between this country and the British islands, is not a profitable one; and we see calculations in some of our public papers, made, no doubt, by British merchants or British agents among us, to this effect. But why do they persevere in this trade if it be unprofitable? Why not permit others to participate in the loss? The suggestions on this head remind me of a circumstance mentioned respecting the first merchant in New York who shipped flaxseed to the Irish market. On the return of his ship, he was asked how the article answered? Not at all, was the reply, it was a ruinous business; but it was observed he soon loaded another vessel with the same article, and then another; still, on the return of each, the story was—that the trade was most ruinous. His friends asked him why he persevered in such a losing trade? He replied, that he must do something to support his family. So those British merchants and agents, who complain that the colonial trade with this country is a losing one, get something to support their families; and what is more, greatly to benefit the English nation.

It may be asked, will not this measure aid in building up the neighboring British colonies on the continent of America? Sanguine calculations, I know, have been made, by some English writers, on this subject: that large quantities of lumber are, and will continue to be, exported from the Canadian territory, by the St. Lawrence, including that which they receive from the United States by Lake Champlain, &c., there can be no doubt, and much valuable timber will be exported from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; but to suppose that anything like an adequate supply for the British home market, and for the British West India colonies can thus be obtained, is erroneous. The climate interposes an insurmountable obstacle to a regular supply. The St. Lawrence is closed by the ice from three to five months in each year.

Not to detain the Committee longer, it does appear to me, that whether you consult the interests of your fellow-citizens, or the honor of your country, this prohibitory bill ought to pass. If it be done now, rely upon it, sir, that a future Congress will, in defence of the rights and privileges of this nation, be obliged to adopt a similar measure, under circumstances more adverse than the present. I can only add a fervent supplication, that Congress may so decide on this, and on every other occasion, as will redound to the peace and prosperity of these United States!

Some amendments here were disposed of, as moved by Mr. BIRDSEYE, and others.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then addressed the Committee. The subject of this bill, he said, was one of great importance and great delicacy. Apathy appeared to prevail in the House during its consideration; and yet never had any subject been before Congress more important in its consequences. It had been observed to him, he said, by an honorable friend, that, in general, navigation and commerce were considered and used as synonymous terms, though materially differing and distinct from each other. It was the correct policy of this country not to attempt to aid the navigation of the country by measures which might be greatly injurious to its commercial interest. It was equally its true policy to accede to any propositions which could not prove materially injurious to commerce, and were at the same time greatly beneficial to navigation. If then no material injury could result to commerce from the passage of this bill, but a great benefit to navigation, the House ought to pass it.

By promoting the navigation of the country, we secure the materials with which we man our Navy, an establishment so necessary to protect the honor and interest of the country. Without an extensive navigation, commerce could not be protected. Some sacrifices therefore were occasionally required from the commercial interest of a country, to attain the great object of an increase of navigation. It was not proper for us perhaps to say that foreign nations, having established colonies which they are bound to protect, should have a right to secure to themselves the whole of the navigation and commerce of those colonies. Such had been the course of all nations, to secure to themselves, in repayment of the expenses incurred by the colonies, the exclusive right to navigation to and from their ports. If we had colonies, Mr. S. said, he did not know that we should not pursue the same course. So far as the history of our Government affords any example on this head, there was an illustration of the same policy on our part, in our refusal to foreign nations of the right to trade with the Indians within our limits without special permission—and he believed a proposition was now on the table to forbid foreigners from trading with them on any conditions. But if a foreign nation, thus holding colonies, derives great advantage from trade with our country, and yet excludes our vessels from any participation in it, if we can coerce her to abandon that policy, we are bound, attending to the interest of our navigation, to do so, if we can do so without the hazard of too great injury to other interests.

The friends of this bill then ought first to show that we can coerce Great Britain to admit us into a participation of the trade with her colonies, without material injury to the commercial and other interests of the country.

The effect of this measure on the commerce of the United States, Mr. S. said, must be considered in two lights: first, as regarded importation, and, secondly, as regarded exportation.

Shall we lose anything, he asked, by prohibiting importation from the West Indies, unless in vessels of the United States? The principal articles of importation are coffee, sugar, and rum. Shall we injure the revenue of the United States, or raise too high the prices of those articles in the market, by the proposed measure? Mr. S. said he thought it could be clearly shown that no injury of this sort would result from it. Not only did we get enough of those articles (rum excepted) from the West Indies and other countries for our consumption, but a surplus was left for exportation. If we are now able to export ten or fifteen millions per annum of sugar and coffee to other countries, and distribute them among the nations of the world, there could be no doubt we should always have enough (supposing our communication with the British colonies to be cut off) for home consumption and to maintain the revenue. Rum indeed could be got only from the West Indies, except in small but increasing quantity from Louisiana, and except a description of that liquor called tafia, which our people will not drink. But suppose we could get none, the brandies of Europe are equally good, and equally if not more healthy; and the whiskey of our country (give it age, or turn it into gin,) was not inferior in his opinion to either. On this point, he said, he spoke experimentally; he had of that liquor six or eight years old, and he preferred it to brandy—though others did not. The people, he said, would get accustomed to it, and it would be generally preferred to rum, which was in no view an indispensable article. From documents on the table, Mr. S. said, it appeared that the revenue from importations in British vessels from the West Indies was about two millions per annum. That revenue, he said, would not be injured, because we must consume the articles on which that revenue was collected from some other source, if not from the British islands.

The next point was the effect which this measure would have on exportation; and here, and here only, was the difficulty. If we can assure ourselves that the colonies of Great Britain cannot be supplied elsewhere with the article which are now drawn from our country for their consumption, we tread on safe grounds. It was fair, Mr. S. said, to state this question in its true light. The British West India possessions drew annually, on an average, from this country six and a half millions of the products and manufactures of the country. She employs in carrying those articles to her colonies (if it were all flour, which is the most valuable article) 60,000 tons of shipping; but the greater part of the cargoes being the bulky article of lumber, she may employ from eighty to a hundred thousand tons of shipping in the trade. The whole amount of our foreign tonnage being 854,000, Great Britain employed in this trade a quantity of tonnage equal to one-eighth of the whole tonnage which we own in foreign trade. It was a desirable thing, certainly, if we could, to participate in that employment of shipping. In doing which we should create a navigation, and educate and bring forward the seamen who are to defend us on our shores and on the high seas, and employ our own manufacturers, mechanics of all kinds employed in ship-building, &c., in that proportion which such an addition to our navigation will require. The articles exported to the West Indies, Mr. S. said, were rice, flour, lumber, corn, horses, mules, cattle, poultry, potatoes, peas, beans, &c., all articles to them of the first necessity, and without which they could not support themselves, nor find materials wherewith to make hogsheds and construct buildings. If they could not get these articles from other countries, they must come to us, and must, if this bill passed, be coerced into admitting us to a participation of that navigation. Could they, he asked, get those articles in other countries? Certainly not upon equally, nor anything like equally, advantageous terms as from us. At this time, had such a law as this have been in existence, the West Indies, as to the whites as well as blacks, would have been actually in a state of starvation; for Great Britain, herself, was so much in want of breadstuffs, as to have been petitioned to open her ports to certain articles, and of course was not able to supply her colonies. He doubted whether, even with good crops, the mother country could supply them with flour, &c. At any rate those articles never could be imported from a distance into the islands in as palatable a state as from this country. Could the islands get these articles elsewhere? It had been stated—and we ought to look at the subject in every point of view, said Mr. S., that gentlemen may vote advisedly—it has been stated that if Montreal was declared a free port on the part of Great Britain, she might thence obtain supplies for those islands; since it is well known that a great deal of flour is made in the neighborhood of the St. Lawrence, which might, in that case, go down to Montreal, and be thence shipped to the West Indies. Mr. S. said he was of a contrary opinion. It might be apprehended that much flour might be got in that way, (which the bill did not provide against,) but for the fact that from thence but one cargo a year could be carried to the West Indies, the ports being shut up in the Northern provinces for six or seven months yearly by the ice. The time the ports were open was little more than was sufficient for one voyage to and from the West Indies. From Canada then they cannot be shipped, and must be supplied elsewhere. That elsewhere, Mr. S. said, they would scarcely be able to find. The article of rice, he said, they could get no where but in America. Indian corn, likewise, they would get no where but from the United States—that article was for their slaves all important. It might be said they could raise it as well as we. It was true that they could; but, if they did, they must take off the slaves and land from a more profitable culture—that of coffee and sugar. They must lessen the growth of valuable articles, in order to grow one of small value. As to the article of lumber, gentlemen from the East had said, the British islands could be supplied from the United States only with that article. On this point it would be proper to state, Mr. S. said, that there was no finer timber than grew on the borders of the lakes, and on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and Montreal could be supplied thence on good terms. The merchants could go up there and buy timber, to be shipped to the West India islands, whenever the St. Lawrence should be open. If they did, however, the article would be supplied at a greater expense and higher price than it could be from our Atlantic border, inasmuch as we could make four or five voyages annually, and scarcely more than one could be annually made from the St. Lawrence to the West Indies, which would greatly increase to them the cost of the article. The article of live stock they could get from no country but ours; on which, Mr. S. said, they are wholly dependent for horses, mules, cattle, sheep, hogs, &c. Even if these articles could be obtained from the British Northern colonies, they could not be thence carried in safety to the West Indies. Even from the neighboring State of New York, the difference of insurance between a cargo of live stock from that State, and one from Connecticut, and carried by Connecticut men, was six per cent. So great was the facility and skill acquired by practice in that branch of trade, &c.

These, Mr. S. said, were his practical views of the subject, which he had thought it his duty to lay before the House—leaving to others to state more at large the political views.

For his part, he said, he had revolved this subject in his mind a long time, and had found it very difficult to make up an opinion on it. One thing was certain: We ought not to embark in the proposed system, unless we mean to persevere in it. After once commencing, we ought to adhere to it, let the consequence be what it might. If we retract, we throw ourselves back into a worse state, than we are in at present. If we maintain the system for a year or two, until the convention of commerce expires, we may, with this act in our hands, make some bargain with the British Government to the advantage of our trade and navigation. The subject, said Mr. S. is well worthy the closest attention of gentlemen. Mature it well in your own mind, and then decide as shall appear correct. If you reject the bill, what will be the consequence? Great Britain will say that you acknowledge yourselves unequal to the contest, and that she may dictate to us, bound hand and foot, what trade we shall pursue. This alternative was a serious one; and the whole question such a one as he should not be surprised if gentlemen found much difficulty in making up their minds upon. It might be said, and no doubt would, that it was a great sacrifice to part with a customer to the amount of six millions per annum. If those articles now exported to the colonies would spoil on our hands, then certainly, Mr. S. said, Congress ought not to pass this bill. If, however, they could be sold to other countries, and would not rot on our hands, that objection to the bill does not exist. As for our breadstuffs, other countries would forever demand them from us, and we should be at no loss for a market. They would demand from us every article save the live stock, which we now export to the British West Indian colonies. The effect, indeed, would be, if all trade should continue interdicted with the colonies of Great Britain, that those articles exported hence to those colonies in British ships, would be carried in our own ships to other countries. Our idle shipping would be employed; the manufacture of ships (the noblest in the world) would be encouraged, and the thousands of mechanics whom it employs, kept employed; and our seamen, to whose bravery and character during the late war we are so much indebted, fostered and retained in our service. Mr. S. concluded by thanking the Committee for their attention to his remarks.

Mr. CADY, of New York, said he did not know what construction had been given to the convention of commerce between this country and Great Britain; but, unless some construction had been given different from its letter, the first section was in direct contravention of that convention. Mr. C. said he could find no provision in that convention, which leaves us at liberty to prohibit the entry of British vessels in our ports, or to impose additional duties on the tonnage of British vessels from any port on earth, unless the West India islands, or British North American possessions. We may tax the cargo, he said, but cannot impose restrictions on their entry. Under the provisions of the convention, if a British ship arrived from Liverpool, with a cargo of sugar and molasses, we cannot prohibit her entry. But, under this bill, if such a vessel has on board a single cask of Lisbon wine, she might be denied the right to enter into our ports. If so, Great Britain would have the same right to deny the right of entry, in her ports in Europe, to any American ship which had on board a single cent's worth of her cargo which did not originate in America. The bill again contravened the convention, as Mr. C. conceived, where it denied to a British subject, residing in Jamaica, the right to enter our ports with his vessel and cargo, although the whole cargo might have been manufactured in Liverpool, &c. He believed that, on examination, it would be found that there are many provisions of this bill, which ought not to pass.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said that the honorable gentleman was certainly mistaken in his interpretation of the treaty. The two great objects of that convention were, it was true, 1st. To place the tonnage of the two countries on a footing of equality in each other's ports; 2dly. To place the cargoes with which the ships were charged, whether in English or American vessels, on the same equality of footing. But an express clause was contained in the treaty, that nothing contained in the second article should be construed to affect the intercourse between us and the West India islands, and the British North American provinces. It followed, from this provision, that if the productions, for example, of the North American or West Indian colonies of Great Britain were carried to Great Britain, it would be lawful for us to interdict those productions from being imported in that circuitous channel into the United States. Otherwise, each party would not be, as provided by the convention, in possession of all its rights in relation to that intercourse.

But, further, the interpretation of the gentleman would lead to a repeal of an important feature of the British navigation act. One of its principles was, that the productions of a country should be confined, in their importation into her European ports, to the ships of that country; that American vessels, in other words, shall not carry into Great Britain the productions of France; and the very case which the gentleman had stated, would, under the British navigation act, subject a vessel to confiscation in the British ports. If an American vessel carried a single cask of the productions of the West India islands, the same confiscation would ensue.

Besides that view of the subject, Mr. C. said he had understood that, subsequent to the passage of the act of Parliament for regulating trade in pursuance to the terms of the convention of commerce with us, the British Government had, in some manner, regulated the terms, as to their cargo, on which American vessels should be admitted into her ports. Mr. C. said he did not know whether the enlarged construction which the gentleman from New York had given to the treaty, might not be beneficial. But, whether or not, that was not the construction of either of the parties to the treaty, and Great Britain had herself acted on a different principle. Mr. C. said he indeed considered it the duty of Congress, in consequence of one of the provisions of that very treaty, to take up this trade, and regulate it in such manner as the interests of this country appeared to require.

Mr. CADY said that any such construction (as the SPEAKER had referred to) given to that treaty, had been unknown to him. What he had contended for was, that we should not be the first to give that construction.

Commercial Intercourse.

H. OF R.

Mr. KING spoke briefly but decidedly in favor of Mr. CLAY's construction of the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. SHEFFEY, of Virginia, after adverting to the question respecting the treaty, in regard to which he expressed his doubts, proceeded, as he said, to make one or two remarks on the merits of the bill. He thought, on general principles, that it did not become a wise Legislature, on every difficulty, to attempt to apply remedies. We have at this moment a clamor of the mercantile part of the community in favor of this measure; but it was questionable, Mr. S. said, whether the existing difficulty did not arise from causes beyond the control of this Government; whether it did not arise from other causes than our exclusion from the British West Indies; whether it did not proceed from the general peace, which had changed the commercial relations of all countries. In his mind, Mr. S. said, it was not wise to attempt to apply remedies, the effect of which we cannot calculate. We ought to sit down and deliberately consider consequences before we attempt to apply remedies to evils, the origin and nature of which, especially, gentlemen did not seem to understand. The principle involved in this bill, Mr. S. said, again brought before the House the question of coercion by commercial restrictions. He thought we ought to be satisfied on this head by a reference to the situation in which we were placed in 1808 and 1809, when we attempted to drive Great Britain from a temporary policy by measures of a similar character. Had we, he asked, been able to effect it? The history of the times showed that we had not. He demanded of gentlemen whether, after failing in the attempt to drive her from an occasional policy, growing out of particular circumstances, they could expect to force her from any part of her navigation system, to which she is so entirely attached, and which she considers so important to her prosperity? He understood, too, that this measure was to apply not only to England, but to all European nations, since all those nations ordinarily pursued the same policy of monopolizing the trade to their colonies. The spirit of the colonial system, everywhere, was monopoly. Although at this moment it was not enforced in regard to the colonies of France or Spain, it did not follow that, after the tranquillity of those countries was perfectly restored, the old system would not be again pursued, by the same nations, of excluding foreigners from the trade with their colonies.

Is there any hope, said Mr. S., that we shall succeed in this warfare? I think there is none. But there is a great evil in a course like that proposed. Commerce will be diverted from its natural channel; the nations which have been in the habit of supplying you, and taking your products in return, will seek other markets. You have experience of it. Did you starve the British in 1807, 1808, and 1809? Were they on the contrary not supplied as abundantly with the necessities of life, after the first shock was over, as ever they had been? If Great Britain should, in consequence of our policy, encourage the culture of those articles we were wont to furnish, Mr. S. said we might find ourselves in a year or two in this condition; that the country would be cut off forever from so much of its market, for the surplus products of its agriculture. He should like to hear, he said, from the honorable gentleman from Maryland, whether the productions of the country which now take that direction will hereafter go to the West India islands, if this policy was pursued. No, he said; for the moment the other Powers of Europe could also carry into effect the colonial policy, they would; there was a disposition manifesting itself among the potentates of Europe to cherish commerce by every means in their power, and they would certainly not neglect this.

I warn gentlemen, said Mr. S., how they begin to tamper with commerce. The same spirit of tampering exhibited itself in 1805 and 1806. It was brought about by the same means, the clamors of the mercantile and navigating interests, though the moment measures were adopted to comply with their wishes, they clamored as loudly against the Government. What, he asked, would be the consequence of this measure, if adopted? The interest of the great body of the country, he said, appeared to be totally neglected here. We hear nothing of the interest of the agriculturists, but it is fashionable to talk about the interests of the merchant and the manufacturer, while the planter and farmer is either forgotten, or remembered only to be made tributary to these classes so inferior in real value and importance. You will have a free port established, said Mr. S.—say St. Thomas. What will be the consequence? This will answer the purpose of the merchants; for, as to them it matters not whether they go to English ports with their cargoes of your produce, or to St. Thomas's; their freight will be the same to one as to the other. The British ship owner also will be served, because his navigation will be employed in taking our produce from St. Thomas or whatever may be the free port. The consumers, the great body of the landed interest, have to pay double freight. Such will be the natural tendency—such the effect of your policy. All parties will be satisfied, to the injury of the agriculturist.

As respected our own products, Mr. S. said, we ought to take a lesson from the experience of 1809. Our produce was then taken to Lisbon and thence elsewhere; but the greater part of it had to pay double freight—and such would be the effect of this system, which would however as effectually stop the clamors of the navigating interest, as if the colonial ports were open. The consumer would have to pay for it.

He was struck, he said, with the inconsistency of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who complained so much of the British policy of interdicting our vessels from her colonial ports, and in the next breath contended that the loss of that commerce altogether would be unimportant, since we got nothing from them but sugar and rum. [Mr. KING here explained.] If the West India trade was important, Mr. S. continued, we ought not to sacrifice it easily; not to make experiments which will certainly deprive us of it temporarily, if not deprive us of it forever. And, if it be of no importance to us, there could be no necessity of making a rout about it. If we even get nothing from the West Indies but rum and sugar, we get the same or nearly the same in value as we carry there of our produce, that is, nearly six millions of dollars. Mr. S. said he had no hope of coercion; he was certain it would not do, but the experiment would ultimatise exactly in the way which he had anticipated.

While up, he said, he would refer to the manner in which different interests were treated here. Last year the agriculturists were taxed for the support of the manufacturing interests; this year it is proposed to tax them for the benefit of the navigating interest. Meanwhile, potatoes and other provisions are imported here from Ireland, and corn is carried from the West Indies into Connecticut. Is a word said about the interest of the agriculturist? No; agriculture is obliged to take care of itself, and in every instance is made tributary to classes of an inferior character.

Before he sat down, he would say a word or two as to the course which he conceived the councils of this nation ought to pursue. It had been said, in reference to the navigation act of Great Britain, that her policy should be ours. It had been foreseen, Mr. S. said, by her statesmen, as long ago as the time of the Commonwealth, that Great Britain was to become a great nation by means of her navigating, and not of her agricultural interest. Those men, seeing their true policy, had taken means to cherish and foster that great interest of their country; they had not made the great interest of their country subservient to the inferior ones. Gentlemen told of the policy of other nations, and invited the House to imitate it. Mr. S. said, they spoke of nations wherein commerce was the great interest, to which the landed interest was subservient. Such, he said, was not the situation of this nation. Here commerce was subservient to the landed interest—was, as had been well said by one of our great men, but the handmaid of agriculture.

Another idea had been broached, that we ought to encourage navigation as a nursery for our navy. If we took the same course, Mr. S. said, we should certainly run the same career as the nations who have preceded us, and terminate that career as every nation had that had commenced it. With all her maritime power, what is Great Britain? Would any man in this country agree that we should change conditions with her? Certainly not. He was not for discouraging naval enterprise, nor opposed to a navy, but not in favor of a navy to the extent of that of Great Britain. He wished not to see the nation cursed with a debt, which would bow its latest posterity to the ground. I am, said he, for a limited navy. I am for a commerce such as will maintain itself, without taxing the great body of this nation for its benefit.

Mr. CLAY made some remarks in reply to Mr. SHEFFREY's view of the construction of the treaty, as affected by this bill.

Some further amendments having been made to the bill—

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, said, he had hoped that some gentleman would have anticipated him in the motion which he felt himself under the necessity of making. He could not help, he said, in the examination of this subject, taking a review of the scenes through which we have passed for the last ten or eleven years. In 1806, he believed, the merchants of the country, uniting, as with a common impulse from every quarter, laid their memorials before Congress, urging them, in consequence of the interruption of the colonial trade, to adopt some regulations which should restore to them the enjoyment of rights violated by the British practice, and pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, to support their country in the legislative warfare then commenced and carried on at their solicitation. The moment the difficulties growing out of the measures thus adopted began to press upon the country, said Mr. J., and the necessity appeared (to use the language of a gentleman lately in debate) of toeing the trig, and standing there at all hazards—of entering into the contest with caution, but, being in, of acting firmly—they abused their Government, abandoned its cause, and traitorously turned their force and power against the country. I am unwilling, sir, to enter on a scene similar to that; to engage, at the instance of the same men, probably, in a course of policy fraught with consequences of the first importance, after the experience we have had from the source I have mentioned. I would be the last man in the House or the nation, indiscriminately to condemn the merchants; there were some who committed themselves on the occasion referred to, and redeemed the pledge they gave. I speak of the great mass of them, who did most traitorously abandon the Government, which, in supporting them, had advanced to that point whence to retreat was irretrievable dishonor, and when the support of the whole country was wanted.

At one time, said Mr. J., we find the merchant not willing to impose high duties on foreign productions, as urged by the manufacturing interest, because they will have the effect to injure trade, and diminish the revenue of the country, and deprive them of the profit of legitimate voyages entered into when no restrictions or higher duties were anticipated; and, when they have obtained a redundant supply of the same articles, urging you to increase the duties on exportation, in order to have the greater benefit of their speculation. It had been justly remarked, Mr. J. said, that the interest of the great body of the nation—the agriculturists—was never consulted; they were the great passive beast of burden, bearing all the weight imposed upon it, and asking nothing of the Government, in their boldest prayer, but to be let alone. Mr. J. said, he must yield to the pressure of a severe cold, and not proceed further in his remarks. He moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

[After some conversation Mr. J. agreed to withdraw this motion for the present, to give an opportunity to Mr. FORSYTH to try the sense of the House on amendments he desired to propose to the bill.]

Mr. KING rose to remark upon Mr. JACKSON's allusion to the merchants having traitorously turned their force against the Government. Let me, said he, ask the gentleman to turn his attention in this respect to the conduct of a whole State in the South. Let me point his attention to an armory built on the banks of James river, for the express purpose (as avowed by an honorable member from that State) of opposing the Government by force of arms!

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, proposed as a substitute for the bill, sundry new sections, embracing a system of discriminating duties, to supersede the clauses of prohibition and exclusion, embraced in the bill, and proceeded, though much indisposed, to assign his reasons for a preference of this mode of counteracting the British colonial regulations, over that before the Committee, and which would, perhaps, induce him to vote against the bill, should his amendment not eventually succeed. The object of either of the two systems would be to produce, by conventional regulation, or otherwise, a relaxation of the colonial system in that particular from which our navigation suffers.

The effect on the British colonial system would be the same, whether duties or prohibitions were imposed on the trade now carried on in their vessels with their colonies. But the effect of the two courses on this country would be very different. The absolute prohibition of all exports to the British West Indies, (which would be the effect of this bill,) would strike off at once six millions of our exports. It might be said that these exports would go to some other ports of the world; that the enterprise of our merchants would find a market. It might be so, Mr. F. said, in the course of time; but the immediate effect would be an extraordinary pressure, and he thought an unnecessary pressure, on the agriculture and commerce of some parts of the country. So far as respected the immediate interest of the agricultural portion of the community, it was a matter of perfect indifference, whether that trade was carried on in vessels of the United States, or in foreign bottoms; and any sacrifice they might make in this respect, to the navigating interest, would be gratuitous. If they agreed, then, by their Representatives in Congress, to impose excessive duties on this trade, as now conducted, it was as much, Mr. F. said, as those interested in navigation had a right to expect. For his part he was willing to make the experiment of heavy duties, but he was unwilling to prohibit the trade entirely.

There would also be a wide difference in the operation of the two systems on the British colonial possessions. If we prohibit the trade entirely, we might do exactly that which the British Government wishes. The whole colonial system of Great Britain was founded on the basis of encouraging the commercial and navigating interest at every expense, and the wishes and inclinations of the colonies weighed not a feather in the balance. At this time the West India islands suffer nothing, and the British navigating interest is fostered and promoted at our expense. No complaint was made by the inhabitants and proprietors of the British West India islands against the operation of this system, because it did not affect them. By imposing duties on the trade, however, a pressure would be produced, which would compel them to resort to remonstrances to the British Government, and which, severely affecting the interests of the proprietors, resident in England, might be expected to produce an effect on the ministry, &c.; and such duties, instead of operating injuriously on our own commerce, would benefit the revenue at the expense of the colonies, and, through them, at the expense of the British nation, &c.

The blanks in the amendment proposed by Mr. FORSYTH, having been filled—

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, rose in explanation on a point which had been incidentally introduced into debate. He had, when up before, referred to the analogy between the state of things at this day and in 1806, and stated that the merchants then came forward in mass with their memorials, urging Congress to take an attitude of resistance to the policy of the British Government, and pledging their co-operation; they had even gone so far as to talk of war, and recommended it in preference to a submission to the then existing state of things. In referring to them afterwards, though he had drawn a distinction between the highminded merchants and those of another description, he had said that the latter had traitorously abandoned the cause of their country, and turned their force and power against it—not meaning that they had opposed their Government by force of arms, but by that moral force, the co-operation of which is indispensable to carry this Government through a war. If men in that situation of life told the community that the Government was taking a wrong course, many would believe them, and they thus subtracted from the Government a vast portion of its moral power. They, therefore, Mr. J. said, had traitorously abandoned the ground on which they had pledged themselves to support the Government, and so far turned their force and power against it. He should not have risen, however, but to put to rights a statement which he understood to have been made on another point, and to which the gentleman from Massachusetts had just referred; that about the years 1799-1800, the armory authorized to be built by the State of Virginia was intended to manufacture arms for the purpose of opposing the constituted authorities of the nation. Sir, I appeal to your recollection, (addressing Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, Chairman of the Committee,) for we were then in the Legislature of Virginia together, whether the fact was so—

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, asked Mr. JACKSON whether he referred, in his observations, to any statement said to have been made by him on this floor? And Mr. JACKSON having intimated that he did—

Mr. RANDOLPH asked the opportunity to make an explanation on the subject; and, he said, he knew not why he did so, for it was full as probable what he said would go abroad not in the shape in which his declaration was made on this floor, the second and the third time, as it had done the first. He would recapitulate—and he referred to the father of that institution, (the armory,) John Taylor, of Caroline, for his correctness on this point. The first time, said Mr. R., that I ever dreamt of being a public man, by election to a seat on this floor, to which I did succeed, I was combatted at Charlotte court-house, and publicly attacked on the ground the gentleman has mentioned, by one of that very numerous class of persons who at that time were staunch Federalists, and since that time have been staunch Jeffersonians, Madisonians, and Monroites, and I have no doubt will be Vicars of Bray to the end of the chapter—one of those persons who said that we are the sepoy, the native troops, and they the proper officers—one of those apostates who are taken in so many instances to the bosom of the political church to which they have apostatised. I was asked, by this person, if I justified the establishment of the armory for the purpose of opposing Mr. Adams's Administration. I said I did; that I could not conceive any case in which the people could not be intrusted with arms; and that the use of them, to oppose oppressive measures, was in principle the same, whether those of the Administration of Lord North, or that of Mr. Adams; that administration, the object of which I had no doubt then, and I have none now, was to change the Constitution of the United States in fact, as it is now changed in substance. If it had continued to persevere in that course of conduct which had given just alarm to the wisest and best men in this country, and particularly in Virginia, Mr. R. said, he had no doubt it would have terminated in an appeal to arms; and it would have done so on the principles of the Revolution of 1688, and of the Revolution of 1776, neither one nor the other of which took place on any other principle than resistance of the encroachments of Government on the rights of the people. At that time, and subsequent to it, Mr. R. said, he understood the temper of the Virginia Legislature (without meaning to say better) as well as the gentleman who had just sat down. My declaration was, said Mr. R., that the armory was erected to furnish the people with arms to resist Federal usurpation, provided the Federal Administration had continued in that career of oppression which it had commenced. Those were his words, which, he said, had been somehow cut off from the main body of his declaration. But he hoped he was not understood to say, that, though in time of peace the State of Virginia was prepared to assert the rights of that ancient and venerable Commonwealth, which after having hoisted the flag that braved the battle and the breeze; the flag that braved Lord North, was not going to succumb to John Adams—which had been then, and now was, as ready to resist the encroachments of this Government, as she was or ever had been to resist the Parliament and Ministry of Great Britain; he hoped he was not understood to intimate that he or that State was disposed to turn the extreme medicine of the Constitution into the ordinary diet—he was no abstract politician. Abstract measures in Government, he said, were what decisions on cases coram non judice were in a court of law. Make out a case, said he; let me see the patient; if he went to a tailor to be measured for a coat, he went to a man who would take him as he was, ill-shaped and ill made-up, not to a man who had but one measure for all statures, and that measure from no living man, but from some fancy of the beau ideal—from the Irish giant or the Polish dwarf—he hoped, he said, he had not been understood to say that, when the enemy was at the door; when his foot was on the soil; when the country was invaded; when Hannibal was knocking at the gates of Rome. No, he never did mean to say, that, under those circumstances, the State of Virginia would pitch upon that time to array herself against the General Government. No, he said, she would fight out the war, and settle the quarrel afterwards. Her uniform policy showed that that was the course which she would in such circumstances pursue. With respect to an honorable assembly, which had been spoken of in this House and out of it—the Hartford Convention—as opposed to the Richmond bayonets, he meant to be on the side, not only of the bayonet, but of the Richmond bayonets. Bring that question ever before him, as an individual member of this House, or as a man, and he would take the Richmond bayonets, to use a sporting phrase, against the Hartford Convention.

Mr. R. said he meant not to deny the right of any State in the Union, Rhode Island, if you will, to assert its rights against the General Government, any more than the right of the people of Virginia to assert their rights against their Government. It was a great revolutionary principle, and he was sorry to say it was at work. He had, he said, but one favor to ask of any gentleman on this floor—to take the words he employed, not a gloss or false misrepresentation of them—which he was sure the gentleman last up had not the least disposition to do. I do say now, said Mr. R., that if the Federal Administration did not halt in its career of usurpation of the liberties of the people, and the Constitution of the country, the State of Virginia was disposed to stand on the bank of the Potomac, and defend that parchment against the bayonets of those who were willing to burn that parchment at the point of the bayonet. But it was not combustible; the conspirators against New Orleans, from above, succeeded no better than its assailants from below; instead of burning the parchment, sir, they burnt their own fingers.

Mr. JACKSON said, he was glad of the explanation the gentleman had given. I am myself, said he, one of the last men in the nation who would quote what comes from newspapers, because misrepresentations occur in them—often accidental, sometimes intentional. But, in our domicile, this day, the gentleman from Massachusetts, reciting what I understood as the amount of my colleague's declaration, asked me whether Virginia did not build an arsenal for the purpose of manufacturing arms, expressly to oppose the constituted authorities of the country; from which, I understood him to convey the idea that such was the statement that had been made on this floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH explained. He did believe that nothing but the awfulness of the times had induced a majority of the Virginia Assembly, at that period, to have launched into so expensive an undertaking as the establishment of the armory. The fair and alleged use of that institution was to arm the militia. Who could object to it? Who would say that freemen had not a right to arm against John Adams and his provisional army, fruges consumere nati, provided they had gone on in their course of usurpation? When he had made the remarks referred to, it was on an amendment to the Constitution, going still further to narrow the limits of State rights, &c.

Mr. JACKSON said, having a distinct recollection of the circumstances of the case, he should proceed with his statement. In the year 1798, said Mr. J., General Wood was the Governor of Virginia, who had been a general officer during the Revolutionary war, but always was, during his life—though standing high in the confidence of the Republican party—an unequivocal Federalist, in the usual acceptation of the term. During his administration, the Legislature authorized the purchase of arms. About that time, Mr. J. said, that he (quite a boy) had been elected to the Legislature, and then first took sides; for, anterior to that time, with the exception of a few distinguished men in Congress, and with the exception of the British Treaty question, the people were not divided into parties. The Governor had contracted with Swann, of Boston, who had delivered at Richmond 4,000 stand of arms, at $13 each—the whole costing $52,000 annually. These arms had been found worthless, on trial, having been purchased in Europe, the refuse of armories and shops there, on speculation. The Legislature, in consequence of that state of the fact, and desiring to provide arms for the State—a measure which had always been a subject of anxiety with General WASHINGTON, without reference to the state of the times; if any such views were entertained, Mr. J. said, he was not let into them—had enacted a law authorizing the establishment of an arsenal at Richmond, in order to get good arms instead of bad. In the next year, (1800,) Mr. Monroe succeeded to the Chair of the State government. Party division was at its crisis. The ferment eventuated in the adoption, by the Legislature of Virginia, of the general ticket system, and Mr. Jefferson succeeded to the Presidency. The armory had been, ever since that day, in operation; and Mr. J. said he never had, until he had heard the suggestion on this floor this morning, (referring to what his colleague had said on a former occasion, in the absence of Mr. J.,) heard a single individual intimate a disposition to oppose with arms the constituted authority of the Government. John Taylor, of Caroline, was a popular man, at the head of the Democratic party, in the Virginia Legislature, in the year 1798. But, if he or any other of the friends of the armory had any such intimation as had been referred to, they had concealed it from the majority; and it had not, to the knowledge of Mr. J., been avowed by any person. As proof of the disposition of Virginia to acquiesce in the execution of the laws, however oppressive, of the General Government, and to resist them only by the Constitutional means of election, Mr. J. said he might refer to the fact, that during that period, the sedition law had been carried into execution in the Capital of the State. True it was that Callender had traduced the Founder of the Liberties and the Father of his Country, but his demerit did not change the character of the sedition law; and the same temper of respect for the law would, in all human probability, have existed, if the punishment of the sedition law had been inflicted on the first man of the State, instead of the vilest miscreant.

Mr. RANDOLPH apologized for troubling the House again, which he should not have done, had not his name been brought into question by two gentlemen on this occasion. He saw now before him, he said, a son of one of those men, to whom he could on all occasions have appealed, who never minced his declarations—never stopped short of the extent to which he was willing to go—never looked one way and rowed another. The times, he said, had been awful at the period referred to. It was certainly true that John Taylor, of Caroline, (a name which would live when many, if not all, of this Assembly were forgotten,) was the father of that armory, which—not meaning to impeach the statement of the gentleman over the way, (Mr. JACKSON)—was built, not so much because of the badness of the arms, as because it was proper for the State of Virginia to keep in her possession the means of arming the militia, rather than depend for her supply on contracts which the United States might stop. The persons who were active in the establishment of that Armory were long-headed and clear-sighted men. Mr. R. said, he was afraid some of the arms since made by the armory were not much better than those supplied by Swann—but that, by the way. John Taylor, Mr. R. said, was the father of the general ticket law of Virginia. He had drawn it, supported it, and had, by Divine permission, made Thomas Jefferson President of the United States. That law had passed but by five votes. At the time, said Mr. R., that I was elected against an opposition raised upon the very ground of a disposition on the part of those with whom I was politically connected, and of myself consequently, to oppose the administration of Mr. Adams by force, Patrick Henry was elected to the Assembly by that part of Charlotte county which then supported the Administration. For, so far from knowing nothing of parties, if I were to specify the time in this Government at which they run highest, I should say in 1798-'99. I leave you to judge, sir, who knew the man, what chance the general ticket law would have stood, had Patrick Henry lived to have taken his seat. Five votes! Mr. R. exclaimed. Patrick Henry was good for five times five votes doubled, in that body. Patrick Henry, said Mr. R., arrayed himself on the side of what he called the Constitution. I heard the last speech he made. He told the people they had, against his voice, made over the purse and the sword. He was a practical politician, and knew, that where these were given away, very little was retained. He saw and depicted, in clear and vivid colors, the danger of a civil war. It would not do for me to attempt to say what, much less how, he spoke to the people. I will only say, that when General WASHINGTON died—in whom all had confidence, but we did not choose to risk our liberties on his life—the first words that escaped the lips of [name not heard by the Reporter] were, "Then is Alexander Hamilton Commander-in-Chief of the American Army!" He was of high-toned politics: we were afraid of him. We did not then know, that he who was next to Mr. Taylor in the Legislature, had, in the Convention, advocated a system as high as Alexander Hamilton's, and perhaps a key or two higher. When this thing took place, I had the honor of being charged on the hustings and in the court-yard with being a Frenchman. I had the honor of being thus charged by the same individual, and the same description of persons who have since done me the honor to charge me with being an Englishman, because I have acted with the same regard to the rights of the people and of the States in opposing one Administration, as I had done in opposing their predecessors. No man in the United States, perhaps, had been more misunderstood, no man more reviled—and that, Mr. R. said, was a bold declaration for him to make—than Alexander Hamilton; unless, perhaps, the venerable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) whom, whatever may be said of him, all will allow to be an honest man. The other day, said Mr. R., when that honorable member was speaking of his own situation on the compensation question—when his voice faltered and his eyes filled at the mention of his poverty—I thought I would have given the riches of Dives himself for his honorable feeling—when he spoke of his poverty, (not that of excess, or of extravagance, but an honest poverty,) after a long and laborious service in the highest offices of the Government. If the gentleman would take it, said Mr. R., I would give him what little I have, to have inscribed on my tomb, as he may on his, Here lies the man who enjoyed the confidence of WASHINGTON and the enmity of his successor!

Mr. PLEASANTS, of Virginia, said, if he recollected the statement of his colleague on a former occasion, which had been referred to to-day, it was something like this: that it was now pretty clearly ascertained that the armory established on the banks of James river was intended to oppose the administration of John Adams, if it went on in its mad career. Mr. P. said, he did not know how that fact had been ascertained. It was a certain fact, that the men who had the principal agency in the establishment of that armory, had most unequivocally disavowed that intention. I was then, said Mr. P., a young man, ardent and zealous in the cause which I then thought, and now think, the right cause. I put more confidence then in the gentleman to whom I refer, than I would now do in any man. I was a member of the Legislature in 1797—the first year an appropriation for arms was made—and in the four following successive years. I perfectly well recollect, in the discussion of the resolutions which made so much noise then, and have since been frequently referred to, John Taylor of Caroline was expressly charged by General Henry Lee, then a member of the House of Delegates, with intending to bring on these measures and the armory, &c., together, and that the armory was in reality intended to oppose the Federal Government; that, whatever other color might be put upon it, this was the object. I never shall forget Mr. Taylor's reply, when, as I understood, in direct allusion to General Lee's situation, his former occupation, and supposed circumstances, contrasted with his own situation, he turned to General Lee, and asked whether he was the man who might be expected to seek redress for present evils in a civil war? Were his circumstances so desperate, he asked; was he the great military leader who was likely to desire civil commotion, &c.? The force of these remarks was felt; for, in addition to the circumstance that his situation was in an eminent degree prosperous and happy in private life, I never did believe Mr. Taylor was that kind of a man, who would seek redress for political grievances by revolution; nor do I believe that he ever expected the muskets manufactured in that armory to be employed in a civil war. If he had thought so, I do believe he never would have used his influence to have had an appropriation made for that object. If he had have done so, he would not have succeeded, had those intentions been avowed. He most emphatically did disclaim, as I do now, any such views. In regard to the general ticket law, there was in that Legislature a man who had much more influence in procuring its passage than Colonel Taylor—I mean the present Chief Magistrate of the United States. I do not believe that all the united force of its advocates would then have carried the measure through that body, but for the weight of character of James Madison.

Mr. LUMPKIN, of Georgia, moved that the Committee now rise; not that he desired to take any part in the discussion of the bill, but in the hope that the House would to-morrow recommence the discussion of the question actually before the Committee, and have done with matters which had no sort of connexion with it.

And the Committee rose accordingly, and the House adjourned.

H. OF R.

FRIDAY, January 31.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and committed to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the office of Attorney General, and to the establishment of an additional Department.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the President and Directors of the Washington Canal Company, of the amount of their receipts and expenditures, from the commencement of their operations, made in obedience to a requisition of their charter; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, for the appointment of clerks to committees; and the same being again read, was rejected by the House.

Mr. LOWNDES laid before the House a correspondence between himself, as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the Acting Secretary of War, in relation to the expenditures and appropriations for the Ordnance and Quartermaster General's departments; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Indiana;" and a bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting to the House an application, by the Minister of France, respecting the long standing claim of the heirs of Beaumarchais; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prohibit commercial intercourse with ports or places into, or with which the vessels of the United States are not permitted to enter and trade; Mr. FORSYTH's substitute being still under consideration—

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that no consideration could have induced him to attend in his place this day, in his present condition, except to say a few words—rather by way of explanation than reply to his worthy colleague, (Mr. PLEASANTS,) which he had been prevented from offering yesterday by the motion for the Committee to rise. He was apprehensive that he had been mistaken by his worthy colleague, perhaps by others, as having authority from Mr. Taylor for the statement he had made yesterday. If he had been so understood he had been entirely misapprehended. He disclaimed all such authority, either from that gentleman or from his other honorable friend—now no more—to whom he had alluded. Had he been the depository of their confidence, he humbly yet firmly trusted that he would be one of the last men in the world to abuse so sacred a trust. He did not call in question one word; he believed every syllable that his honorable colleague had uttered. He had said, truly, that he was at that time a member of the Assembly—and he might have added, with equal truth, that no man of his years was in fuller possession of the confidence of that honorable body—a confidence that had grown with each succeeding year—for it was merited. The object of this confidence, so honorable both to the giver and the receiver, was of that happy temperament which exempted its possessor from many of the sorest ills of life. Sir, said Mr. R., I do not believe that my worthy colleague has made a personal enemy in the whole course of his life. I never even heard that he had a political one. This was not the only circumstance, Mr. R. said, in which he differed, greatly to his disadvantage, from his colleague. No misrepresentation of his (Mr. P.'s) language or conduct was within the scope of probability—supposing such, however, to occur, he would never stand in need of defenders. There could be no cause of surprise, therefore, at his (Mr. R.'s) solicitude to reconcile any apparent or conceived difference of opinion with one so generally loved and respected.

Mr. R. said that the only favor he asked at any man's hands who had quoted him on that floor, was to use his very words, and to take them altogether. He hoped that he was not understood as complaining of any unfairness or misrepresentation on the part of either of his honorable colleagues—far from it. He was not in the habit of using words without some definite signification attached to them, and nothing was easier than by a supposed paraphrase of one passage and the omission of another, by which it was qualified or limited, utterly to distort the original meaning and intent of the speaker. What had he said? A question being under deliberation to abridge materially the rights of the States, he had declared that, "by the timely and judicious exercise of the very right proposed to be taken away, this Union had been saved from incalculable mischief and misery. That by throwing (as she had an undoubted right to do) her whole weight into the electoral scale, the Commonwealth of Virginia had constitutionally effected a change of ministry, and checked the mad career of ambition and usurpation, which otherwise she might have been compelled to resist at the hazard of the greatest of all calamities, the abject surrender of their rights excepted, that a people could endure—of a civil war—for there was no longer any cause for concealing the fact, that the grand armory at Richmond was built to enable the State of Virginia to resist, by force, the encroachments of the then Administration upon her indisputable rights—upon the plainest and 'clearest provisions of the Constitution—in case they should persevere in these outrageous proceedings." And why had he so said? Because the principles and the men of that day, such excepted whose practice belied their then professions, had been laid aside, and new principles, more convenient for men in power, and new men—men whose names, at that time, and long since, had never been pronounced out of their own parish, had come into play. Mr. R. said he hoped no invidious construction would be put upon his words. He had been of sudden growth himself, somewhat of a mushroom, when he first started up in the world of politics. He stated a fact, without drawing any inference from it.

He had no doubt that Mr. TAYLOR had given a characteristic reply to General Lee on the occasion. He recognised the man in every word that his honorable colleague (Mr. PLEASANTS) had ascribed to him. It was not his (Mr. Taylor's) business to give an advantage to an artful adversary; to injure, by a premature disclosure of ultimate and contingent views, which might not be, and in fact were not, realized, a noble and a holy cause. It would not require the sagacity of a Tacitus or a Hume to divine what were the intents of the master spirits who then sway the councils of Virginia. The historian of those days would look to their deeds—nor was there anything in the language of Mr. Taylor to mislead a sagacious mind from his true meaning. It would be enough to recollect that the Assembly held its sitting in sight of that very church on Richmond Hill where, in March 1775, Patrick Henry, with a master's hand and prophet's fire, rent the veil that shrouded from the eyes of our first statesmen (himself excepted) the true condition of affairs, and laid open for the first time the necessity of a resort to arms. Nor will it be forgotten that the great measure adopted in 1798 and 1799, was the very same proposed by him twenty-four years before, on the eve of a rupture with the governing head of the empire, viz: arming the body of the people—and who would dare to say that the people were unfit to be trusted with arms?

Mr. R. asked if there was no case in which his colleague could justify resistance against the encroachments of Government upon the privileges of the people or the rights of the States? The question was, like every other question touching human affairs, to be governed by a sound discretion. The Assembly displayed that discretion; they acted under a high responsibility, with a dignity and firmness which had long characterized and he trusted would ever govern the proceedings of that ancient and venerable Commonwealth. They had sagacity to perceive the approaching danger, and wisdom and courage to make timely provision against it. They did not content themselves with resolutions and reports. They were statesmen, not professors in an university. They knew that logic was no match for the bayonet, and they provided bayonets; at the same time taking care to put themselves in the right by a most unanswerable and triumphant appeal to acknowledged facts, and to the great charter of the Confederacy. And, sir, said Mr. R., did Virginia stand alone, in this fearful, this impending conflict of authority, between the parent State governments and this bloated, pampered, overweening Federal Government—this creature of concession from the States, now spurning its creator in the intoxication of power? No, sir, the eldest daughter of Virginia, the eldest sister of the younger branch of this great political family, took the lead even of her venerable parent. John Taylor, of Caroline, had publicly announced, under his hand, that the resolutions of the preceding session of Assembly, moved by him and ascribed to his pen, were drawn by the present President of the United States, then in retirement at his seat in the county of Orange. Sir, (said Mr. R. to the chairman, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) I did not stand as you did in the relation of consanguinity to the mover of the Kentucky resolutions, but I was in habits of political intimacy with him, and I assert, without fear of contradiction, that the resolutions moved and carried in the Legislature of Kentucky, on that memorable occasion, sprung from that same vein of rich red land between the Rapidan and James river, which has proved so favorable to the Presidential growth.

Mr. R. said, that when he spoke of the present President of the United States as "next to Mr. Taylor," in that session of the Assembly of Virginia, 1799 and 1800, he did it in reference to the activity and zeal displayed by each in procuring the passage of the General Ticket Law, the great measure of the session, on which the approaching election of President hinged. Did the gentleman recollect nothing of Mr. T.'s leaving the House and going home, which, by some, was construed into a ruse de guerre to draw away from the seat of Government members opposed to the passage of that bill, although otherwise hearty in the cause of opposition? Mr. R. had some reason to believe that Mr. T.'s absenting himself on that occasion was the effect of disgust. He returned, however, set his shoulder to the wheel, and the bill was passed. Mr. R. said, that if he felt anything like disrespect for the character of the President, this was a time when he would studiously avoid showing it. He bore testimony to the correctness of his colleague's declaration respecting Mr. Madison's great weight of character and of abilities in the Legislature of Virginia, and added that, as he (Mr. R.) had not been bred an idolator, to worship the rising sun, now that the President had no longer power or patronage to bestow—now that "his orb was sinking temperately to the West," even he would not be deterred from saying of him that he was a great man—for such he unquestionably was in some respects—and he sincerely wished him all happiness in his retirement, as sincerely as he wished it for himself.

Mr. R. again adverted to the state of things in 1798 and 1800. He said that the opposition of that time was guilty of the grossest hypocrisy, if it was not alarmed at the standing army, small as it was to what we had since seen with approbation. For his part, he felt the apprehension which he had not scrupled to express. He should never forget the declaration of one of the ministerial leaders, the first session that he (Mr. R.) served in that House, that the standing army (upon a motion to reduce it) was necessary to keep the partisans of France in check. Another leader, second in activity and in reputation for influence to none, ventured to hint, not in public indeed, at a partition of Virginia by the Blue Ridge, or by James River, or both. The cry was that Virginia was overgrown; that she was unmanageable, (yes, she was unmanageable, thank God!) that if the country south of James River could be detached from the rest of the State, "the friends of government, of order," that was the language, might cope successfully with the "anarchists," and the south side of James river would not be powerful enough to give much trouble to Administration. Hardly (said Mr. R.) were the designs of the Federal Government concealed. The partition of Poland was decreed, but Poland had turned upon and discomfited the partitioners. Mr. R. appealed to public rumor at the time, and declared that he had the fact of a design to partition Virginia, and the alleged reasons for it, from his lamented predecessor in that House, (Mr. VENABLE.) Gentlemen talked of "admissions" and "confessions." He had made none—he had none to make—he had no apologies to offer—Virginia stood on her defence—the knife was at her throat—she was to be humbled in dust and ashes, and if she had not resisted, would have richly deserved the chains that were forging for her. Was the contested election, which almost immediately ensued between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Burr, forgotten? We did not then rely upon the Richmond armory, not yet in operation, but on the United States armory at Harper's Ferry. At that day, when the Constitution itself was put to hazard, rather than relinquish the long enjoyed sweets of power; when the sun rose upon this House, balloting through the night and through successive days for a Chief Magistrate—(he well remembered the scene)—had we not the promise of Dark's brigade, and of the arms at Harper's Ferry, which he engaged to secure in case of an attempt to set up a pageant under color of law to supersede the public will, after defeating the election by the pernicious abuse, under the pretence of exercise of Constitutional right, to support one of the persons returned by artifice, whom they professed to abhor. General Hamilton had frowned indignantly upon this unworthy procedure, for which he paid the forfeit of his life. The conduct of this great man—for such, although Mr. R. differed with him in many points, he truly was—first opened his eyes to his much abused character. At this period of approaching confusion and general dismay, the President elect—then Governor of Virginia—had deemed it advisable to establish a line of videttes from Richmond to this place. One of his colleagues, then present, (Mr. SHEFFLEY,) could tell something about these videttes, having made the expense a subject of inquiry at a subsequent session of the Legislature. Every appearance betokened the breaking up of the Federal compact, when the opponents of the public will, constitutionally pronounced, tardily and ungraciously gave up their opposition, and Mr. Jefferson was installed.

Mr. R. said that hostility to Virginia was the cardinal principle of the politics of a great variety of descriptions of persons, who agreed in nothing else. Having discernment to perceive that her influence in this Confederacy was owing yet more to the nature of her institutions than to her territory or population, no opportunity was let slip of attacking them. Their stability was not the least part of their value. To strike at them is to aim at the heel of Achilles. It was realizing, too, the fable of the fox who had lost his tail. Virginia must have a new constitution, arithmetical, geometrical, and metaphysical—what you will but common sense and habit, worth all the visions that ever floated before the imagination of moonstruck philosophers. Mr. R. entered into a refutation of some of the vulgar errors on the subject of his native State, which prevailed even on the north bank of the Potomac, and would disgrace a Virginia school-boy. The ignorance prevalent upon this subject was scarcely credible, and the mass of these vulgar errors would swell a folio equal to that of the celebrated Sir Thomas Brown. On the exemption of lands from debt, he said the law of Virginia was, with some relaxations, that of England, the greatest commercial country in the world. They had no law impairing the obligation of contracts, whereby a fraudulent debtor, become bankrupt to-day, might drive over his half-shod creditor to-morrow in a splendid equipage. Once a debt, always a debt; once a wife, always a wife, except in very severe cases, when the Legislature did sometimes, but rarely, grant divorce. These were the great outworks of our honesty and morals. And he declared that there was not a country on the face of the globe, where, in proportion to the value of the transactions, so little money was lost by bad debts, or where the standard of female purity was higher.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Massachusetts, said it was with reluctance and diffidence that he attempted to obtrude himself upon the notice of the Committee; but, as the measure now under discussion was confessedly the most important which had been, or probably would be, agitated during the present session of Congress, and as it was one in which his immediate constituents have a deep stake, he felt it to be his duty to submit a few remarks for consideration.

The question now pending before this Committee being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, which is to substitute a bill "supplementary to the act regulating duties on imports and tonnage," &c., in lieu of the bill referred to this Committee, entitled a bill to prohibit all commercial intercourse, &c., or, in other words, to substitute discriminating duties in lieu of a total prohibition of trade, &c., Mr.

B. said he should, in this stage of the proceedings, give his vote against the amendment. I do it, said he, because I believe a majority of the shipping interest whom I represent are in favor of the prohibitory bill, as the measure most efficient and best calculated to subserve their interests, and because, if I had a settled opposition to it myself, which I have not, it being merely doubtful in my own judgment, I would not incur the responsibility of defeating, by a vote of mine, a measure which is deemed essential to the best interests of a highly respectable portion of my constituents. That I should have doubts on this subject, with my limited means of information, cannot be matter of surprise, when those concerned in the shipping interest are not agreed among themselves, some believing the present discriminating duties sufficient, others believing they ought to be greatly increased, and a third class believing nothing will be effectual short of prohibition. But that something ought to be done, is very generally agreed.

While endeavoring to consult this portion of my constituents, I am not unmindful of another class of them who may feel hostile to this measure, under an impression that their interests are to be put at hazard—I mean those who manufacture and furnish the lumber, the great staple of the District of Maine.

No one could be more averse than myself to give sanction to a measure calculated essentially to injure their interests; nor do I believe either of the measures proposed would do it. A temporary depression of the price might ensue, but not an entire loss of the market. The lumber must still be in demand, and the British West India colonies must have it, either in our vessels or their own, directly or indirectly.

That our navigation, Mr. Chairman, is in a state of dilapidation and decay never before known, is, I believe, a fact generally admitted. You have it stated in various ways, and particularly in the petitions which have been presented from different parts of the country during the present session of Congress. It is represented in some of those petitions that foreigners are now our exporters and importers; that instead of being the carriers, as heretofore, of other nations, we are not now the carriers even of our own produce. That while American ships are condemned to lay at the wharves, a heavy tax to their owners, and daily going to ruin, the flag of their rivals rides triumphant in our harbors, and they are taking from our own merchants that trade which once afforded the means of their livelihood and prosperity. To the truth of the existence of such scenes and such sufferings, I can add the weight of my own testimony, from my personal observation.

But should Congress, or any member of that honorable body, be disposed to shut their eyes and stop their ears to the complaints and sufferings of any section of this country, which is not to be presumed, they are called upon to regard them from motives addressed to the interest of the Government—from a regard to the revenue, which springs principally from foreign commerce, and which must be essentially affected by the destruction of our navigation. They are reminded of the importance of cherishing our navigation as the great nursery of our seamen, who are to man that navy, which is the surest means of our maritime defence, and who during the late contest shed so much glory on the American name.

While every one must be convinced of the existence of these evils, they cannot so readily respond to the inquiry, What is the remedy? The Committee of Foreign Relations, who are charged with the subject, have submitted their plan, which is a prohibition of trade with ports and places from which United States vessels are excluded, for which I shall give my vote.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that when a new and important measure is to be adopted, (such as the present,) its friends are bound to show that it will produce the desired effect. This, I trust, has been done, in part at least, by those who have preceded me in debate, and to others who may follow, more conversant with the question, and more competent to discuss it, I leave the task of finishing it.

I cannot, however, forbear, while I am up, from suggesting a few remarks which occur to me, and which, if not perfectly satisfactory, may furnish hints which may be useful in the progress of the present discussion.

Mr. Chairman, the value of merchandise, the produce and manufacture of the United States, exported to the British West Indies and their adjacent American colonies in 1816, is stated in an official document at $6,069,900. Now, if the consequence of the measure proposed to be adopted, should be a total loss of a market for so large a portion of surplus produce, and the question was distinctly stated to any honorable member of this Committee, whether, under an impression of such an effect, he was in favor of it? the ready answer of each would be, no. But, sir, will that be the consequence? My answer is, I think not.

The articles which we furnish are principally lumber and breadstuffs—I believe some naval stores and live stock.

Can the British colonies obtain these articles from any other source on as good terms? I believe no one will pretend they can. With all the supplies which may be obtained from Quebec, derived through Vermont, New York, and Canada, and the small supplies of lumber from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, still there will remain a great deficiency. If this is not the case, how happens it that since the peace, British vessels, in defiance of the existing heavy tonnage duties, have crowded our Eastern ports for lumber?

I conclude, therefore, if the prohibitory bill passes, we shall still find a market for our surplus produce. It must go where it is needed, directly or circuitously. Such a measure will probably induce the British to open one or two free ports, one in the colonies adjacent and one in the West Indies.

If this is done, and the carriage of produce to the free ports be confined to our own vessels, as it ought to be, our ships will again have employ, under the disadvantages, indeed, of a throng of vessels pressing to these free ports, and liable to produce a glut in the market; but still it may be preferable to the present state of things.

From this view of the subject, I think it may be inferred that the adoption of the measure will not produce the loss of a market for our own produce. Neither, I think, shall we sustain any disadvantage from a loss of the supplies which we now receive from the colonies. They will be conveyed to us through the same free ports. But if not, we are not dependent on the British West Indies for our sole supply of West India goods, rum perhaps excepted, which comes principally from the English Islands. But if deprived wholly of their rum, it would, in the opinion of some, be no loss; and, at any rate, might be supplied by the brandies from Europe, and the spirits distilled in our own country.

Should the prohibitory law not find a support in this Committee, and the amendment be preferred, I shall feel myself bound to support that, as the next best measure, provided the rate of duties be not fixed too high. For on this subject my opinion is, that if you mean prohibition and exclusion, the fairest and best course is to pass the prohibitory law, and do the thing openly and boldly.

If you still mean to admit foreign vessels from the ports and places where the United States vessels are excluded, let them come under heavy, but not intolerable, burdens. In so doing, while you tax them to an amount which they are able to bear, you add an income to your own revenue, an important and essential circumstance in a national point of view, and you preserve and continue a proper price and value to our surplus produce.

In addition to these circumstances, I think you will by this measure excite such an interest in the West India planters, as, on some future occasion, may turn to good advantage. The heavy tax on foreign tonnage and goods imported in foreign vessels, must eventually fall on the consumer of our surplus produce in the colonies—so I view it—and, if I am correct, it will operate as a powerful inducement in the West India planters, to use all their influence to obtain a free trade. They now pay, I venture to assert, for every thousand feet of lumber double the price they would pay, if a free trade was permitted to United States vessels, and probably, if not double, considerably more for every other article derived from the United States.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate, the situation of the plaster trade has been described. Though it may appear inconsiderable in the eyes of honorable gentlemen here, permit me to say that it is a trade of considerable value and importance to the section of the country from which I come. A law has passed the Legislatures of the British Provinces, and received the regal sanction, which imposes, in effect, a duty on that article of about four dollars per ton, which is about the first cost of the article, if landed at any place north of Cape Cod. The prime object of this measure is probably to secure to their own vessels the exclusive carriage of the article to the Middle and Southern States, where it is chiefly used; but, if carried into execution, will produce another effect: it compels the inhabitants north of Cape Cod to pay a tax of four dollars per ton, for what may be had in that portion of the country. The law is, however, at present suspended by the authority of the Provincial Governor. But it is justly viewed by the inhabitants of Maine as a most odious measure, and the interference of Congress is respectfully claimed for some defensive countervailing measure, as well to avoid so disgraceful a tax, as that they may participate in the carriage of the article, which now gives employ to 20,000 tons of shipping, and a considerable number of seamen.

In conclusion, sir, permit me to express my most sincere wishes that Congress will duly regard the complaints and sufferings which have been made known to them during their present session, and adopt measures of relief, if not such as are adequate to the demands of the petitioners, at least the best in their power to devise.

After Mr. BRADBURY concluded—

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, (after a prefatory remark or two not heard by the reporter,) said that Congress were now about, perhaps, to commence regulations, the extent of which, and the consequences to arise out of which, no man could perfectly foresee; and these regulations were advocated on grounds, which certainly he should not contest, but which had not heretofore prevailed among those who now arrayed themselves in the foremost rank in support of the bill before the Committee. Mr. W. said, he was not one of those who objected to a portion of the community pursuing, partially at the expense of another portion of the community, but for the benefit of the whole, any particular branch of commerce, or of manufactures, or any other species of industry which it may be eligible to follow. He did not object, he said, in other words, to a portion of the community pursuing navigation, partially at the expense of other interests of the country; but he did object to its being pursued and cultivated exclusively at their expense. One reason why he preferred the amendment to the bill was, that, after trial, if the expected benefits did not result from the system, we could go back from it with a better grace than we could from the other. We seem, said Mr. W., to have accomplished, within a few years, a political circle; on the strange revolutions we have gone through I will not remark, further than that the same section of the country that, a few years ago, so decidedly opposed all sorts of commercial interdiction for important results, is now contending for it, to attain an end not so important, certainly, though I will not detract from its importance, as that for which formerly the same system was resorted to. He would not say, this difference was the result even of any change of opinion; still less would he say that the support of the present bill, and the hostility to the former restrictive system, arose from any difference in the degree of pressure of the present and former systems on particular sections of the country.

Gentlemen, he presumed, were not perfectly apprized, though he hardly supposed that many of them did not know the fact, that the policy which they recommended, of a total prohibition of all intercourse with the British colonies, was that policy which some of the most violent politicians in Great Britain had recommended as the means of adding to their prosperity. He alluded particularly to a pamphlet on the colonial policy of Great Britain, which there was some reason to suppose recommended a system of conduct, if not pleasing, yet certainly not altogether displeasing to the British Ministry. The very measure of total prohibition was that which the author of that work recommended as the best mode of securing the consequence and importance of the North American colonies, and making the West Indies entirely independent of the United States; and of crushing the prosperity of a country which they look upon, at no very distant day, to be their commercial and political rival. Considering, Mr. W. said, that the very measure upon which the Committee were now called on to act had been recommended for adoption in that country, was a reason why they should deliberate, and maturely too, before they ventured on such an experiment. Nor was the reasoning contained in the book to which he had referred, so altogether destitute of foundation. The trade we carry on with the British West India possessions consists principally of lumber and breadstuffs, and a portion of live stock. With regard to the lumber, it was stated in the pamphlet, that the average annual supply for the British islands had been 117,000 loads, of which 13,000 had been imported from the United States, and 4,000 from elsewhere. But that in 1810, during the existence of our restrictive system, the port of Quebec alone had exported 160,000 loads to those islands. Possibly, Mr. W. said, a considerable portion of this came from the United States; but the whole effect was to increase the quantity exported from the British North American possessions. Of breadstuffs, perhaps, no very great supply could be calculated on from that quarter; but that was not the only dependence of the islands. It was recommended in the work referred to, and the advantages of such a change plainly shown, to grow a part of their breadstuff in some of the islands, Trinidad particularly.

It was worthy of consideration, Mr. W. said, how far, after we went into a system of exclusion and prohibition, the British might, under possible prospective circumstances, for the supply of the West Indies, coalesce with Spain to reduce the revolted colonies, or with those colonies themselves for the supply of the islands now and forever hereafter, independently of the products of this country. The disposition of the people of the islands, particularly the Island of Jamaica, and excepting Barbadoes, was generally in our favor. If that was the case, any measure affecting their interest so as to cast a prejudice rather against us than the mother country, was defeating the end in view. The measure ought to be such, if any be adopted, as to make the colonies look to the mother country as the source of our regulations. To attempt to produce a relaxation of the British system by an extreme measure, did not seem to him to be the dictate of sound policy. We ought not, he said, to try the extent of our power at once. We ought not to pursue a policy, which, should it fail, would leave us in despair of any alternative. He was not, he said, in favor of any temporary measure; we ought to do what we intend and believe to be effectual; but we ought not to apply the harshest and strongest measure at once.

Among other phenomena which this debate had produced, had been the quotation of the opinions of a distinguished gentleman once at the head of this Government, on a question relative to the colonial trade, by gentlemen with whom, Mr. W. said, he was happy to find that opinion had considerable weight. But of an authority that is quoted, we must, according to fair rules of construction, take the opinion altogether; and that opinion did not sustain the arguments which gentlemen had built upon it. Mr. W. here referred to and quoted some passages of Mr. Jefferson's letter, which had been referred to by Mr. KING, and said that the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, as far as it had weight—and no man would give it more than himself—rather showed the necessity for an increased tonnage duty and a prospective exclusion, than a total prohibition at once.

I am one of those (continued Mr. W.) who would oppose any measure or any course of measures which tended to divert the industry of any portion of the community from the channel in which it ordinarily flows. I am not one of those who, because we have a large portion of waste lands, and because in many parts of the country agriculture is the best pursuit, would resort to any measures particularly favorable to that, but prejudicial to other branches of industry. A portion of our people, he knew, were essentially amphibious, living partly on the water and partly on the land, who must in like manner be permitted to pursue their natural habits. But, on the other hand, said he, I would not consent to promote their individual advantage at too great a sacrifice; and, as we are called on now to say what we will do, and how far we will go, we ought to take our measures with such precaution as not in the first instance to commit ourselves to pursue them after they are found to be detrimental instead of beneficial.

With regard to the operation of increased duties on this trade, though he preferred them to prohibition, yet, Mr. W. said, he could not suppose they would, as the gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to suppose, be entirely paid, or paid in any great degree by the West India islands. The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury (for whose opinion, Mr. W. said, he had the highest degree of respect) was altogether different: that the duty would be paid altogether by ourselves. An increased duty on imports would very evidently be paid, in a great degree, by our own citizens. With regard to a tonnage duty on outward-bound vessels, indeed, it would operate, in a small degree, as an export duty attaching to the articles exported, and would be paid in the West India islands. But, under correction, he should suppose the other duty would be paid by citizens of the United States; at least so much of it as was requisite to bring up the value of the article imported to the cost of the same article from other countries on not as favorable terms as it would otherwise have been from the West Indies. Such would certainly be the effect, unless the price should be so far enhanced by the duties, as to cause the West India productions to come so much higher than the same articles from other countries, as greatly to reduce the consumption of them.

If it could be distinctly ascertained, on this subject, what was the sense of the mercantile part of the community, or of a considerable majority of those who compose it, Mr. W. said, he should be ready to go as far as any gentleman in securing to them the rights and advantages which ought to belong to the trade in question. But there seemed to be a very great diversity of opinion, even among themselves, on the subject; and gentlemen in favor of the bill had delivered themselves so doubtingly that, from their argument alone, he should be almost inclined to question the propriety of acting at all on this subject; but certainly the conclusion would be, if anything was done, there was no necessity for trying, in the first instance, the full extent of all our powers on this subject. If, in 1805 and 1806, by the unanimous voice of the same class of the community, the same measures had been demanded for protecting their interests; if, subsequently, the adoption of measures similar to the one now proposed, became, in the highest degree, exceptionable to those who had called for them; there was some reason to believe, if we pursue the same course, (particularly when the opinions of the merchants are not so decidedly expressed as they were then,) we shall come to the same result. Whatever was done, Mr. W. said, he was disposed to see done with the consent and hearty approbation, and present and future support of those for whose benefit it was done. He did not wish that Congress should be accused hereafter of so regulating commerce as to destroy it; not that they should receive the reproaches, instead of the gratitude of those for whom they made serious sacrifices.

With regard to one particular branch of commerce, referred to by the gentleman who last spoke, it was certainly desirable that some regulation by duties should take place—he meant the plaster trade—because, as to that trade, the Government could be compelled to admit us to a participation in it, or the trade itself would be wholly destroyed, the principal and almost only market being the United States. The article must either not be brought at all, or indifferently in British and American vessels.

The Committee had been told, in the course of this debate, very confidently, from a high authority, that the necessary effect of a total prohibition would be, to compel the British Government to admit us into participation of the trade with her colonies. We all know, said Mr. W., that the colonial system is a part of the policy which European Governments adhere to with the greatest pertinacity, and never relinquish. He had seen predictions somewhat similar to this on former occasions, not altogether verified by the fact. He did not say that, in those cases, important effects had not been produced; on the contrary, whatever had been the opinions of gentlemen at that time, arising from the excitement of party feelings, our restrictive system had produced great effect on the British West India islands, where the distress of the inhabitants had been nearly as great as in 1785—not quite so great, for at that period a considerable number of a part of their population had been destroyed. If, however, our restrictive system, operating severely as it did, was found not to produce ultimately the effects expected from it, the Committee ought to receive with some grains of allowance an appeal to it at this time to resort to that system to produce a relaxation of the British colonial policy.

We ought to recollect also what had been frequently heard on this floor, and what, to a certain extent, was certainly a legitimate argument, that the tendency of all systems of total prohibition was to promote, in that section of the country where it operates most, a spirit entirely hostile to every species of fair commerce, destructive to the morals of the people, tending to the diminution of the revenue of the Government, and to the defeat of any system the Government might pursue for the purpose of operating on the commerce of rival Powers. A total prohibition, he said, would be evaded, particularly on the Eastern frontier and on the Lakes, in defiance of all the force, civil and military, of the Government. A large portion of the products of the United States would thenceforth go to the ports in Canada, and thence, as British property, to the colonies. To a considerable extent heretofore this had been the case—adopt this measure, and it would become so altogether—and the very circumstance of a large portion of breadstuffs and lumber, going to the colonies, indirectly, through those ports, would be an encouragement to the British Government to persevere in its system, and would be adduced as an argument of the competency of the British provinces in the North to supply the West India islands altogether. He had, he said, no belief in the effect of this measure to compel the British Government to admit us to a participation in the navigation to and from her colonies.

It was certain, he said, that the present state of our navigation was imputable to the return of the European Powers to the system, in regard to their colonies particularly, which they had always pursued in peace; but also to the circumstance of a large portion of our commerce engaged in the war trade not now being required for that trade, and not being otherwise profitably employed. The suffering of the navigating interest was caused by the amount of our tonnage being greater than can be used in ordinary times. This was an evil which even this measure, granting it the fullest success, would not entirely remedy.

Without intending to commit himself upon the course he would ultimately pursue, either in relation to the bill or the substitute, he had ventured hastily to offer his crude notions on this subject. He should not have done it, he said, if he had not perceived but little interest taken in the measure, or if he had heard as general an expression of the opinions of gentlemen on the question, as, on so important a question, might have been expected. The bill, he said, embraced an important question: it was the commencement of a system which might lead us to results, of which many gentlemen were not perfectly aware. There was a beautiful allegory in the history of one of the most celebrated of the ancient Republics. He meant the contest of Neptune and Minerva for the patronage of the city of Athens; to which the one had offered the olive, that elegant type of good government—

"The rich olive, underneath whose shade,
The green herb greener grows,"

—the symbol of peace. While the gift of the other was the horse—the instrument of war. Seeming thus darkly to shadow out the truth that agriculture is essentially pacific, while commerce (though commerce is not, as it was then, mingled with piracy) has yet, when pursued with too much avidity, always a tendency to endanger the harmony of nations. Whether this is what was meant, or whether, as has been ingeniously supposed, it was an allusion to some attempt on the part of its first rulers, to divert the attention of the people from the navigation of their narrow sea, to the cultivation of the earth—it would, in either event, furnish an instructive lesson. All such attempts must forever be made in vain. The occupations of a people are determined by their situation, their interests, their habits—and these, even in the subsequent and more disastrous period of that Republic, were not to be changed at the command of their rulers. To make them forget their naval greatness and glory, to turn their affections from that element where had been their triumphs and their strength—the rostrum, or tribune, from which the orators addressed the people; the Bema, he believed it was called—he begged pardon if he did not give it the true Attic pronunciation—which, formerly, was in view of the port and shipping, was removed to a different spot; its very shape, which had been that of the prow of a vessel, was changed—but no change was effected in the dispositions of the people.

An attempt on the part of Congress to change essentially the dispositions of the mass of the people, "whose home is on the ocean," would be futile, ungenerous, and unjust. At the same time, Mr. W. said, he would not pursue or force navigation, by measures which would hazard, in a considerable degree, the safety, interests, and general welfare of the great body of the community.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said, that in one sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Georgia, he most heartily concurred—that the measure contemplated by the bill, or by the proposed substitute, was the most important, as respected at least our foreign relations, that had come before Congress at this session, or would probably be brought before it for some years—a measure, which, whatever fate attended it, ought to attract the attention of honorable members of this House, and to which, he hoped, before the final question on it, they would give the most mature consideration.

There was no doubt, Mr. C. said, that a great part of the depression under which our navigation now labors, was not peculiar to this nation; but there was as little doubt that we experienced it in a less degree than some other nations, particularly our great rival in commerce and navigation. It was owing principally to the state of peace throughout the world, that we, instead of being the carriers for other nations had become the carriers for our own country only, thus greatly curtailing our navigation: though it was no doubt also, in a material degree, effected, as stated by the President in his Message, by the colonial policy of Great Britain, which excludes us from a participation in the trade with her colonies.

Independent of its intrinsic importance, Mr. C. said, this subject presented itself in an imposing attitude, as forming one of the most prominent points of the President's Message. The importance of the question by no means depended simply on the value of the trade between this country and the colonies of Great Britain. But, considering the question as it related merely to that trade, when the fact was stated, that it consisted of six millions of dollars imports, and of course a like amount of exports, it must be admitted the question was one of deep import, compared to any which at present presented itself to the attention of Congress. But, as was stated in the President's Message, Mr. C. said, it was not solely important on account of the effect of the colonial system on that trade, but the fact was, that the exclusion from a participation in that navigation essentially affected the trade between this country and the British European possessions, and, by the operation of the system, deprived us, in a great measure, of the benefits of the convention of commerce with Great Britain, which provided for the establishment of a perfect reciprocity of commerce between the United States and the British European possessions. It was not necessary to trouble the Committee with the details, he said, but it must be admitted, that where a British vessel could carry two cargoes, whilst the American could carry but one, the advantage must be greatly in their favor. Even if gentlemen were not disposed to do something to obtain for the navigation of this country a participation in the colonial trade, they ought to go so far as to place them on an equal footing as regarded the European trade. Some measure ought to be devised, by which the navigation of Great Britain should be prevented from enjoying peculiar advantages over us, in a trade wherein reciprocity had been solemnly promised by the convention to which he had alluded.

H. OF R.

It appeared to him, Mr. C. said, that the gentlemen who had spoken on this question, as well as some who had not spoken, but with whom he had conversed, had mistaken the nature of the measure now before the Committee, and confounded it with the embargo, and the whole train of restrictive measures. The present measure, he said, was of a character totally different. The embargo, the non-intercourse and non-importation systems were adopted as substitutes for war, to produce a revocation by Great Britain of her Orders in Council, and by France of her decrees. These orders and decrees of the belligerents were intended to act on each other. Of course, if it were true in point of fact, as he contended it was not, that the restrictive measures of this Government had failed in producing the desired effect, it was no reason why the measure now proposed, should fail; the cause of the failure of the measures referred to, having been that Great Britain had a greater interest at stake, in the contest with France, to maintain inviolate those Orders in Council, than she had in conciliating the wishes and participating in the commerce of this country. Those measures, if they had have failed, would have failed because the measures of Great Britain were intended to operate on France, and through us upon her. But in regard to the policy of Great Britain, which this bill proposed to countervail, it operated on this country alone, and was connected with no belligerent purpose. It was not a fact, however, Mr. C. said, that the embargo and other restrictive measures did fail. He would not go into that question at this time; but he would assert that they in fact produced the repeal, in the first place, of the decrees of France, and afterwards of the Orders in Council of Great Britain—an effect produced too late, however, to avert the war previously declared by us against that nation. There was, certainly, no real analogy between the system proposed by this bill, and that restrictive system which the United States had formerly adopted.

Let us, then, said Mr. C., inquire into the character of the evil proposed to be remedied, and of the remedy that is offered. What is the evil? Great Britain says that the whole commerce between her colonies and the United States shall be carried on in British ships, absolutely excluding American ships from any participation in it. The most natural course of the exchange of commodities between nations might be thus defined: that each nation should carry its own products to market; that we should carry of our produce what we do not want, but they do, to British ports; and that they should bring what they do not want, but we do, to our ports. With this course, however, Great Britain was not satisfied. The next, and perhaps the most equal and best mode of providing for the free and fair interchange of commodities, was, to open the trade equally and reciprocally to both parties, to let each carry the commodities of both countries, in a fair competition. Great Britain was not, however, disposed to do this. She not only prohibited the carriage of her colonial commodities in our vessels; not only entirely engrossed the export trade from her colonies, but refused to allow us any participation, by conventional regulation or otherwise, in the trade to the colonies. The effect was, to deprive us of the advantages in the augmentation of our commerce, and increase of our seamen, which would result from the carriage of our own produce, to the amount of six millions of dollars annually.

With regard to the importance of encouraging our navigation, he said, he need not resort to argument. The question of the importance of a navy to maintain and defend our rights, which had been some years ago a question of a theoretical nature, was no longer so: it was now a question of practical experience. All felt its importance, and all acknowledged the expediency of cherishing, by all means in our power, that important branch of national defence.

Gentlemen alarmed themselves, Mr. C. said, by the apprehension that the other party would view as inimical any regulations countervailing her colonial policy, and that the issue of this conflict of commercial regulations would be war. Mr. C. said he believed in no such result. If an exclusion of the navigation and shipping of Great Britain from our ports be a measure of a hostile character, said Mr. C., Great Britain has set us the example; for she excludes our navigation and shipping from an extensive range of her ports. Mr. C. considered this rather as a diplomatic than a hostile measure; but, if it were otherwise, she had set the example, which she could not complain if we followed.

But, said he, let us look to the fact. What would be the light in which Great Britain would view any such regulations as are proposed by the bill? The Convention of London contains an express stipulation on the subject; and I will observe to gentlemen, that the clause which exempts the colonial trade from the second article of the convention was introduced with the express view of retaining in our hands the right to countervail the British regulations in this respect. It was so understood by the framers of that convention. But, said Mr. C., we have later evidence than that which is furnished by the terms of the convention. The President, in his Message at the opening of the session, says, that it is ascertained "that the British Government declines all negotiation on this subject; with a disavowal, however, of any disposition to view in an unfriendly light whatever countervailing regulations the United States may oppose to the regulations of which they complain." Thus, then, we have evidence both from the nature of the case and from the express declarations of the British Government, that it will not, because it cannot, view in an unfriendly light any regulations which this Government may find it expedient to adopt to countervail their policy. Mr. C. said he did not think that the adoption of this policy on the part of Great Britain ought to excite any hostile feeling towards her. She was not singular in this respect. Every country that has colonies in the West Indies, and which is not too weak to defend them, endeavored, he said, to appropriate to itself all the advantages of the trade with those colonies; and it would be found that the relaxation of the rigor of that system, by one nation or another, was precisely graduated by the degree of ability to maintain their colonies in peace and defend them in war. There was nothing in the regulations of Great Britain which could be offensive, or possibly lead to war. They might be complained of as selfish or unfriendly—they certainly were the former. But Great Britain had a perfect right to set the example before us; and the question was, whether the total exclusion of our ships from the colonial ports of Britain, was such a measure as we ought to fold our arms and submit to, without an effort to obtain some part of the trade which she had attempted to appropriate exclusively to herself?

Gentlemen had properly said that this was a question which ought to be well weighed before decided. Whatever we do, said Mr. C., it ought to be with a determination to adhere firmly to it. For, depend upon it, Great Britain will never lightly relax her policy. This is proved by the history of the failure of all attempts to obtain a relaxation of the policy by negotiation, from the first establishment of the colonies to this day. Mr. Jay attempted to negotiate on the subject, but failed in his object. Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney tried: they failed, being obliged to be satisfied with the introduction into the rejected treaty of a clause similar to that in the late convention, that each nation should be at liberty to regulate trade with the colonies as it pleased. I need not say, added Mr. C., that those who negotiated the present convention of commerce had the subject anxiously at heart; that they strove all in their power to incorporate in that compact some regulation allowing participation in the colonial trade; they failed, however, as others had before them. The failure of a more recent attempt at negotiation on the subject was alluded to, he said, in the passage of the President's Message which he had already quoted. The policy of Great Britain, it followed from these facts, was deeply laid in selfish considerations—a policy which she had never relaxed, except in periods of war when it became her interest to do so, from the commencement of her colonies to this time. The measure which we address to her interest, to induce her to relax from the rigor of her colonial policy, should be a measure framed with ample deliberation, which, when we adopt with resolution, we will maintain with fortitude. For, the first conclusion of the British Government would undoubtedly be, that the American Government would be incapable of maintaining its regulations for any length of time; and that Government, in the expectation of a retraction of the measure, would persevere in her policy as long as she could. What we do, therefore, we should do knowingly, and should do it well; with an unalterable determination to adhere to it until it has produced the effect it was designed to accomplish. I will go further on this subject, said Mr. C. So deeply rooted in the hearts of the British people is the sentiment that the retention of the colonial policy is essential to their commercial prosperity and maritime greatness, that I contend, if any measure of yours is to produce an effect on the Government in regard to it, it must be by enlightening the public sentiment of the British nation in regard to its true interests—for no ministry would find itself capable of relaxing that colonial policy, and hold their seats one month thereafter. In any measure you take, you will have the colonies to back and aid you—they being always anxious for the most enlarged and liberal trade. But you must also carry conviction to the mind of the British people, that they have a greater interest in giving up than in adhering to the colonial policy, before they will surrender it. Convince the people of that, and the Ministry will let you into the trade; but not before.

The question which presents itself, then, is, whether we will adopt measures to induce a relaxation so desirable to our interest? What ought to be done, if anything is? There were two propositions before the House, and the question now was on substituting high duties for the prohibitory system. Mr. C. said that he preferred the prohibition; and if any gentleman would candidly compare the merits of the two proposed remedies, he would find that the whole value of the remedy, by the imposition of duties, was derived from its approximation to prohibition. He objected to increased duties for various reasons; first, because they would operate on ourselves, for that would unquestionably be their first effect; though he admitted we might, by diminishing in a degree the consumption of the colonies, and letting in rivals to their trade, on more advantageous terms, operate on them. As respected our exportation, also, these duties would operate injuriously on us, by diminishing the consumption of our produce in the colonies, without materially distressing them. Mr. C. favored the system of prohibition for other reasons. It met the British regulation by a measure of the same character, operating exactly to the same extent. It neither stopped short nor exceeded the measure of which we complain. He preferred prohibition to duties for other reasons. The value of the latter system must arise wholly from the diminution of the consumption of the colonial commodities here, and of ours there, and might lead to a species of strife of restrictions, &c., which the prohibition system would avoid. It would be preposterous, said Mr. C., for the British Government to complain of the system of exclusion. The answer is at hand. You have set the example of imposing restrictions on the trade; do you set the example of taking it off—as you withdraw, so will we. This measure can lead to no collision but what is amicable. The system of duties would not be felt so immediately by the colonies, or by the people of Great Britain, upon whom, he had had the honor of stating, we must produce an effect before we can reach our object. The measure, therefore, which we adopted, must be one which could not be mistaken in its character; in regard to which it would be utterly impossible for the present Government or its Representatives to mislead the colonies, or deceive the people of Britain. Such a measure, Mr. C. said, he took prohibition to be; such a measure he took the proposed substitute not to be. If we laid duties, for instance, the British Ministry might say—"America may lay what duties she pleases, what right have you to complain?" The colonies might, indeed, inquire into the motive of the imposition of those duties, but, if they did, they could not ascertain it; it might have been the augmentation of the revenue, as well as the object which is now sought by it. But when they find a system of prohibition established precisely in retaliation of a similar law of Great Britain, it will be impossible to deceive them; they could not fail to see the cause of the evil, for which a remedy would be sought in a revocation of the measure which provoked the United States to that course. But, it had been said, that the effect of a total prohibition of intercourse would be evaded; that Montreal would be declared to be a free port, and the commodities destined for the consumption of the West Indies would be accumulated in depot in that city, and thence transported to the insular colonies to supply their wants; that thus the channel of supply only would be changed, without affecting the amount of the supply of our products to the British West Indies. Mr. C. said he did not believe in any such result. He thought the gentleman from Maryland, yesterday, in the practical view with which he had favored the Committee, had satisfied them that such could not be the result. Nature, Mr. C. said, there stepped in to prevent that diversion of the trade from its ordinary channel, and, by the occlusion of the St. Lawrence, prevented that river from being the channel of the regular and certain supply required for the maintenance of the West Indies. The gentleman from Maryland had shown that but one or two voyages could be made from a port in the St. Lawrence, instead of the three or four voyages which might be made in a year from the United States, and that the supply from that quarter, therefore, must be deficient.

Mr. C. begged leave to add another argument, which, if he was not wholly mistaken in all his views of this subject, would be conclusive. It was this: that the effect of the proposed prohibition would be to deprive the colonies of a market for their produce, to the amount of six millions of dollars. It was not sufficient for gentlemen to show, even had they succeeded in doing so, that the wants of the colonies could be supplied from the St. Lawrence, but it must also be shown that they could find on and near the St. Lawrence a market for their products in return. This proposition, simply announced, demanded the assent of all. The ability to purchase depends on the ability to sell. If there is a political truth, it was that, he said, which he had stated. If, then, we cut off a market for six millions of the commodities, with which they had been in the habit of purchasing an equivalent amount of supplies, though we leave the road open, we deprive them of the means of obtaining those supplies. A certain quantity of sugar, &c., might be smuggled on the lakes, but to what amount? Sufficient for the consumption on the borders of the lakes alone; for it would be impossible to introduce such articles in that manner for the supply of the seaboard. The expense of transportation would be such, that it would be impossible for the merchant to come into competition with the same commodities, imported from other quarters. The amount which the colonies could sell on the lakes, would be somewhere about half a million of dollars. The products with which they could supply themselves in that quarter, must be limited to the same amount. And gentlemen must show that a market can be obtained for six or seven millions in amount, before they can prove that the colonies can procure (if it were possible to procure at all) their supplies from Canada.

Suppose the measure of prohibition be adopted, what would be its effect? In the opinion of Mr. C., a mere change in the direction of the trade. St. Domingo would be open to us, St. Thomas, Santa Cruz, and possibly St. Bartholomews, and other islands and ports. But, if not one port should be open, the necessity Great Britain would be under to obtain supplies for her colonies, would dictate the expediency of opening some port at which an interchange of commodities could take place. If this operation took place, all that is proposed to be effected by the bill is accomplished, by the participation of our navigation in the transportation of the articles thus exchanged. Our ships will have obtained in employment, in carrying our products to that entrepot, and bringing return cargoes, of the same amount they would have now, if American instead of British ships wholly engrossed the trade. There might, in the case supposed, be some little increase in the cost of the articles, but so inconsiderable as not to amount to any offset to the great advantages accruing to this country from the employment of its tonnage.

The present moment, Mr. C. considered as particularly propitious to the adoption of this regulation; because, as regarded the great direct trade between the United States and British ports in Europe, that was regulated and unalterable for near three years. It stood on the footing of convention; and we should not, by any regulation adopted in regard to the colonial trade, put to hazard the advantages in the other, at least until that convention expired.

Regarding this regulation in another view, he anticipated beneficial effects from it. In consequence of the weakness of some of the Powers of Europe in their maritime force, they had found it convenient to open ports to us, which were formerly shut, and we could thence draw our supplies; thus effecting a mere change in the channel of supply, with the advantage of the employment of our own navigation, as already stated. South America, besides, would be open to us, and we could there obtain a large portion of the commodities we import from the West Indies, except, perhaps, the article of rum. Whether that could be obtained there or not he did not know. Sugar might be obtained in quantity from Louisiana, where the product of that article increased every year. Georgia, and a portion of South Carolina, too, had turned their attention to that object; and the effect of this measure would be to encourage the cultivation of that article. With respect to the article of spirits, if its importation were totally cut off he thought it would be a benefit. He believed, he said, that America was the only country that imported as great a quantity of spirituous liquors; every other country he was acquainted with used more of its own manufacture. If, said Mr. C., you exclude entirely, by a permanent regulation, the article of rum, and substitute domestic liquor for that portion of rum consumed here—and I agree with the gentleman from Maryland, though I have not perhaps his experience, that the article of whiskey is better, in every point of view, than the article of rum—you promote the agricultural interest, and particularly that portion of it from which I and the gentleman come.

Mr. C. assured the Committee that, on this occasion, he was influenced by no local views. If the interests of that part of the country which he represented would, as they possibly might in some respects, be prejudiced by this measure, yet, on a great national question, in which the honor and character, as well as best right of the country are concerned, he should most cheerfully surrender its partial interests for the general good. He said the character of the country—for would any gentleman say that it was to be endured, that a most important part of the carrying trade should be taken from us, and that we should tamely submit to it? It was intolerable, he said, ought not to be endured, and would not long.

I think, then, said Mr. C., that the suffering of the navigating interest, to which the attention of Congress is attracted, is one which calls loudly on this body to do something to alleviate it. It is attributable greatly to the colonial system of Great Britain, though no doubt also greatly to the state of peace, and the consequent resumption of their navigation by the Powers of Europe, who during war suspended a great portion of it. Taking care of the interests of the nation, and guarding our commerce against the effect of foreign regulations, it becomes us to act on this subject. He should, he said, cheerfully give his assent, therefore, to the bill before the House; and should vote for it, but with reluctance, if the amendment proposed by Mr. FORSYTH should succeed. He had intended to have touched some other points, he added, but had already spoken too long; and was warned by that circumstance, as well as by an indisposition under which he labored, to bring his remarks to a conclusion.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, said he rose on this occasion to make suggestions rather than express opinions; to receive information rather than to give it. The House had been told that this bill was introduced for the purpose of assisting the commercial and navigating interests of the United States. As respected the commercial interest, Mr. R. said little could be argued in favor of the measure—for the disadvantages of it to agriculture would be considerably greater than any possible benefits it could afford to commerce. With respect to the navigation of the United States, there arose a national question—that being an interest in which the nation has a property. What, he asked, was the nature of that navigation? It did not depend on the shipping or tonnage employed by the merchant; not on the prosperity of the ship owner or builder, but on the American seamen, emphatically, who were employed in navigating our vessels. He, then, called upon gentlemen to give him some demonstration of the efficacy of this bill in increasing the number and abilities of our seamen, before they could show to his satisfaction that the nation had any interest in the passage of this bill. He wished not, he said, to pass laws for the encouragement of one interest to the detriment of another, unless for the advantage of that part of our navigation in which only the nation had an interest.

Was it, Mr. R. asked, important to the commercial interest whether our produce and foreign produce be carried in foreign or American vessels? No. Was it important to the nation that these unemployed ships should cover the ocean, unless they were manned by our own seamen? He said, no. Did this bill provide, or was there anything in the policy of the United States which did provide, that seamen of the United States should be employed in the ships to be built and the tonnage now employed? These were questions he should like to hear solved.

We had no right, Mr. R. said, to consider this question in regard to the conduct of Great Britain as respects her colonial trade; we had no rights in regard to it. The measure now proposed did not stand on the footing of the embargo and non-intercourse, and, if it did, but few gentlemen he believed would be found to favor it. But, said Mr. R., have we been wronged? Are our rights affected by the British colonial policy? I take it they are not. If I were to give my vote for this bill, it would be singly and exclusively with a view to that kind of benefit which would result not only from an increase of our navigation, but from securing it to the seamen of our country. He would, for such an object, consent to make a sacrifice. Why? Because they are necessary to the naval strength of the country, and any sacrifice for their encouragement he should consider as a tax for the defence of the country, and would cheerfully impose it; as he would not hesitate to lay a tax on the agricultural, or any interest, to add fortification to fortification, and for improving and arming the militia. If this bill, then, would encourage and increase the number of our seamen, he would vote for it, but on no other grounds. He had not the slightest regard, in this case, to the interests of the people of the State which he represented; if a great national purpose was to be obtained, and could be demonstrated as flowing from the bill, he should vote for it. Until he had further information than he now possessed, however, it was extremely doubtful how he should vote on the question. He should not vote for the bill with a view to any retaliation. If the colonial system of Great Britain was universally acquiesced in, we had no right to complain of it; and, with respect to that view of the subject, he should not act on it.

In his voyage last Spring from Baltimore to New Orleans, there was on board the vessel in which he sailed but one native American seaman. Was it of importance in a national point of view that that vessel should navigate the ocean? It was not, but if the vessel had been manned by American seamen, it would have been. As to the mere employment of ships, Mr. R. was averse to entering into any war of competition for it, considering the object as not worth the struggle.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, in noticing the remarks of the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) premised, that he should occupy the attention of the Committee but a few minutes. He had followed the honorable gentleman, he said, from the commencement to the conclusion of his argument, and, without mere parliamentary courtesy, he would say, that his statements had been made with great strength and accuracy; the question before the House had been treated with great candor, and placed in a strong point of view, and the policy which ought to govern every member in his vote was placed fairly before the Committee. But, Mr. H. said, he had followed the gentleman to see to what result his course of reasoning would bring him, and to see whether the measure now proposed was a remedy for the evil complained of? For that, after all, was the point on which we should keep our eye.

What, then, was the result to which the Speaker had brought the Committee? He had stated, with great force and truth, Mr. H. said, that the House was entering on a business of most important magnitude, from which they ought to forbear, unless they could bring their minds, and that of the American people, to the point of a persevering contest and trial. We are, said Mr. H., about to attempt what has never been effected by any nation on earth; to compel Great Britain to abandon a policy which, as the gentleman expressed himself, is deeply rooted in the hearts and interests of the people, who believe that on it greatly depends that maritime strength essential to their national existence. The honorable Speaker had fairly put the House on its guard, Mr. H. said, and told gentlemen not to vote for it, unless they had courage to persevere in it. It would not do to go half way in this system; we must see it through—persevere, or make not the attempt.

This bill then being the great measure proposed for no less an object than to compel Great Britain to abandon a system she believed essential to her national greatness, the question presenting itself to the Committee is, not whether the object be attainable by any means, but whether the measure now proposed affords that means. On the Speaker's own ground, if the measure proposed was not of a kind likely to produce the desired effect, it ought not to be attempted; if it was likely to fail from want of courage to persevere in it, or from its own nature, it ought not to be undertaken.

Mr. H. said he did not propose to show, nor did he mean to say that the resolution of the American people might not be found equal to the support of a measure involving great privations, if certain to answer a beneficial purpose; but he thought he could show, be their resolution what it might, that the measure now proposed never could produce the desirable end sought by its friends. The honorable Speaker had told the House, that it was in vain to seek to produce an effect on the British Government by the wishes of the colonies, because those wishes were already sufficiently known, and if the wishes of the people of the islands were sufficient, the desired effect would be produced without the intervention of any measure on our part. The result direct from this proposition was, Mr. H. said, that any measure operating on the colonies alone could produce no effect on the British Government; and that, therefore, any measure intended to operate on the latter must be addressed to something else than the feelings or interests of those colonies. It was not even sufficient, the Speaker had argued, to produce conviction in the Ministry of Great Britain; since, so rooted in the hearts and understandings of the British people was the sentiment that the colonial policy is essential to the maritime strength of the nation, that not even the Ministry dared to meet and oppose this national feeling. The measure to produce a remedy, then, must, from the Speaker's own showing, be addressed to the British people. Do not let us, said Mr. H., embarrass our strength by a measure in a wrong direction, in a remedy applied where the disease is not to be found. Can the bill on our table, then, I ask, have the slightest effect to convince the British people of the error of their policy? On the contrary, if as effectual as possibly could be imagined, it will not in any way affect them, and will leave us just as far from the desired end as it finds us.

Of course, then, Mr. H. said, after following the Speaker to his conclusion, and agreeing in all his premises, he had looked with anxious solicitude to the application, by the gentleman, of his argument, and expected that he would have shown that the effect of the bill would be to reach the feelings and opinions of the British people. But when the Speaker had come to his conclusion, it was that the bill would affect the colonies, but not a syllable about its effect on the British people, on whom only the gentleman had clearly shown its operation could be of any avail. The effect was to be this—and doubtful at best—to deprive the colonies of six millions of trade.

Would the people of Great Britain, Mr. H. asked, care a farthing about that? Would they not, if they believed the colonial system essential to their maritime strength, rather give them the money every year than touch that colonial policy? They surely would. The proposed measure, then, which would bear injuriously on our people to a degree which it was admitted would require courage and perseverance to sustain, if it produced its greatest possible effect, would have no bearing on the true point, according to the honorable Speaker's own showing.

But, was it a fact, this policy being adopted, that the British West Indies would be deprived of an import and export trade to the amount of six millions? The fact stated by the honorable Speaker respecting the opening of neutral or intermediate ports, entirely destroyed his own argument on this point. Admit, if you please, said Mr. H., that the British West India colonies should be deprived of this trade, I still doubt whether that consequence would produce so strong an effect as totally to change a sentiment described as being rooted in the hearts of the British people, and induce them to surrender a system which it has been their pride and policy to maintain, under all circumstances, for a long course of years.

Mr. H. said he had thus briefly stated the result to his mind from the premises of the honorable Speaker. If what was necessary was what the Speaker had suggested, the measure proposed as a remedy would not remove the evil, would in fact only operate to distress ourselves.

Mr. CLAY rose in reply. He admitted, he said, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had very fairly and correctly noticed the weak point of his argument. Mr. C. said, he had assumed as proven some points which had been maintained by other gentlemen, particularly by the gentleman from Maryland, one of which was, that the supply of the commodities obtained by the colonies from this country, could be obtained nowhere else. He had presumed, also, that the disposition of the colonies was already favorable to a liberal and free trade. But it might be that the colonies were at present in favor of a free trade, and yet their feelings not so roused, as to produce effect from their remonstrances, as they might be expected to be by the passage of this bill. We know, said Mr. C. that the colonies of all countries are averse from restrictions on commerce, but that they generally acquiesce in them. If pushed to a state of starvation, however, in consequence of this policy, they would not fail of producing, by their remonstrances and appeals, an effect on the parent country. Mr. C. said his argument respecting the value of this trade to the colonies, and of course to the parent country, was not applicable simply to the value, but to the nature also of the commodities in which that trade consists. Although the amount of the trade might be inconsiderable in regard to the whole amount of the trade of Great Britain, if it were indispensable, as he thought had been proved, to the colonies, the loss of it might awaken such a feeling, first in the colonies, and, by sympathy, in the mother country, as would induce a relaxation of the rigor of the British system. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, therefore, to rebut his argument, must show, what Mr. C. believed him unable to do, that the colonies could obtain their necessary supplies elsewhere.

One effect Mr. C. believed would flow from this measure, in a degree at least, that Great Britain would draw, for the supply of her colonies, those products which we have sent and shall send to other colonies. If this was effected, we should have achieved the great object of securing to our navigation the transportation of our own products.

When up before, and speaking of the possibility of Montreal being made a free port, Mr. C. said he had not adverted to the fact, that the region of the lakes did not now in fact consume anything worth taking into account that comes from the West Indies. The people of that region made principally their own sugar and spirits. Therefore, if the position was true, that a nation cannot buy where it cannot sell, Montreal could not be a substitute for our ports.

The great question was the modus operandi of this bill, to use a favorite expression of a member of another body. Operating on the sympathy as well as the direct interest of the parent country, it would induce her to relax her system. Great Britain would find a greater interest in securing the amount of six millions of trade, necessary to support and cherish her colonies, than she would gain merely on the transportation of the articles of which that trade consists. That was the question on which the British people would be called on to decide; and he believed the effect of this measure would be such as to induce them to decide in favor of admitting us on a footing of reciprocity into the West India trade. If the British Government did not take this course, it would have to wink at the formation of entrepôts, by which the object proposed by the bill would be substantially accomplished.

On this subject, Mr. C. said he ought to state, that, if the bill were to pass, it would be necessary to introduce a further provision into it; for otherwise the British Government might declare Moose Island in the North and Amelia Island in the South to be entrepôts, and thus evade our measures. Mr. C. said therefore he would propose a limitation to particular latitudes, so as to make the intermediate ports, if established, such ones as should secure us all the advantages we might have a right to expect from them.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia said, he would ask the honorable Speaker one question; rather desiring to ask it of him now than after he resumed the Chair: Whence came the cry for this measure? From what particular section of the country? Do you not find it (said he) in the Message of Governor Smith, of Connecticut, to the Legislature; in the Message of the Governor of Massachusetts; and in a certain description of prints? He would not ask the gentleman whether it was to be found in his convention or not. If these British Ministers would not relax their policy at the peril of losing their seats, Mr. R. said they would hardly relax it for our relief. If the English would lose six millions of trade by this measure, we should also lose the market for our horses, mules, staves, and lumber; there were two sides to that bargain; and he really thought it was refining a little in wisdom, to suppose that these English Ministers, who understand so well their interest as regards their places, as to regard the public sentiment of England, and not the clamor of the colonies—he wished every minister always understood the subject as well, and every people their own interests as well—that they would relax, to give us relief. Suppose the British Government should not yield. Why, then, we are to go to South America, and get these six millions of the articles we now get from the West Indies. Could we do so? Mr. R. asked. Would the people of South America take our staves, our lumber, our horses, our mules, and our jackasses? Should we carry coals to Newcastle? How should we pay for these articles?

But the gentleman asked, where would the British colonies get supplies, since, as he had also said, it had been demonstrated by the gentleman from Maryland—Mr. R. was sorry he had lost the benefit of that argument, for the gentleman must have demonstrated what was undemonstrable—that the colonies could not get them but from us. Why, Mr. R. said, these very South American colonies, whom the gentleman wished so heartily to see recognised, could furnish these very articles. And the opening of them, so far from being the remedy to the evil under which we labor, would actually aggravate the disease.

It was very well known, Mr. R. said, that previous to the American Revolution, these colonies, then provinces, had an open trade with the West India colonies, and got a habit of supplying them, which even the American war did not entirely break. If that did not entirely break it off, but at its conclusion the intercourse was renewed; if the islands could go seven years without our supplies, did the gentlemen believe that they could not do without them for any length of time? This idea of starving the West Indies—of bringing Great Britain to her marrow-bones, was suggested in 1807;—we had tried all these things, and our measures had been wholly unavailing as to their avowed object. After remarking on the effect of our measures heretofore on the colonies, Mr. R. said, that our system then, was liable only to the same objection as the gentleman's system now, that it produced directly the reverse of the effect which we wished it to produce.

We set about starving England and coercing her by refusing to receive her manufactures; we found that would not do, and we have now set about raising manufactures of our own—as much as to say, for he was stating it argumentatively, that the power of receiving British manufactures being a great power, it was the interest of the country to destroy that power. So it was now proposed to act in regard to the colonies. The fact was, Mr. R. said, that at the last session of Congress a combination of interests in this House—not speaking disrespectfully of them therefor; for in bodies politic they will continue—male and female created he them; they will unite—you cannot keep them asunder—a combination of interests at the last session of Congress had given the heaviest blow which has yet been inflicted on the navigation, of which the honorable member had spoken to-day, and which he was convinced it was the interest of the United States, in one point of view, to foster and encourage. But gentlemen in a certain quarter of the Union, Mr. R. said, had done all they could to convert the trident into the distaff, and now called upon the House to pay the cost of converting their spindles into new tridents.

In his humble judgment, he said, there was but one view of this question in which we have a serious interest. He could not look at it without going back to our former system of commercial restriction, which had ended, as selfishness and ill-neighborhood generally does, in a fight. In that too this system would end, provided it had the effect the gentleman had anticipated from it—for, Mr. R. said, he wished it to be understood that he grounded his arguments on the efficacy of that which he believed would prove utterly inefficient and futile. Knowing what I do, said Mr. R.—little enough God knows, but enough for this—I look forward to the day when we are to have the great struggle with Great Britain for the mastery of the seas; to which, as to length of duration and bloodiness, Mr. R. said, the great contest between the naval forces of England and of Holland in former days was but a skirmish. If the object was to encourage this contest, to hasten the struggle, by making regulations to get us all the seamen in the world, and raise as many of our own as we could, in one view of the subject this measure ought to be adopted. But, supposing it could reach the mark, Mr. R. said, he was not prepared to give his assent to the bill. This was one of those instances in which theory did not prove in practice what was expected from it. Not that he denied, that if this country was to be defended against a great maritime Power, it must be by a fleet—on that point he had not the slightest doubt; but his own opinion was, that it would be as well for the present to count, and not only to count but to pay the cost, of the last contest before we courted another. Not that he believed that would be done. I was once visionary enough to believe, said he, and the progress of the payment justified it, that we were about to present to the world the spectacle of a nation, having funded its debt, that paid it—but no such good luck for us. Unfashionable as it had become, denounced (or renounced, should he say?) by its old supporters, and certainly not taken up by those, in this particular instance, who once opposed it, Mr. R. said he was still for the doctrine of retrenchment, of economy, taking the hand of this Government out of the pocket and off the person of the citizen wherever it can be done—off the person, he said, for the effect of putting the hand in the pocket is to put it on the person—he said off the person, especially, in respect to this system of great maritime force; for, said he, you may have all the seamen in the world, and let war break out, there is no mode by which you can command the service of a number of seamen sufficient to man a respectable force, but by impressment. For, if we go into the system of bounties and premiums, in time of war, of bidding for seamen the price which will command them, when neutral nations are giving the highest prices, we go into a system that this country, great as it is destined to be, even under the grossest mismanagement, cannot support. I will trouble the Committee no longer.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks to show that the extension of our navigation, particularly under the regulations proposed in regard to the proportion of American seamen to be carried by our vessels in foreign trade, would certainly tend, as Mr. ROBERTSON had desired to be proved, to strengthen our maritime force, increase the number of our seamen, and keep them in our own service.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, February 1.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the committee appointed on the petition of William Smith, senior, of Charleston, South Carolina, made a report, which was read; when, Mr. M. reported a bill for the relief of William Smith, senior, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John Thompson.

Mr. SHARP, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel H. Harper; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate "to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Indiana," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate "to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government; and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill of this House of the same title.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "to prohibit all commercial intercourse with ports or places into or with which the vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade." Mr. FORSYTH's motion, to substitute high duties in lieu of the measure contemplated by the bill, being still under consideration—

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, rose to express his views of the subject. His preliminary observations escaped the reporter; they were, however, principally descriptive of the policy of Great Britain in regard to her West India colonies, and replicatory to those who had in debate advised against attempts to counteract it. If, indeed, it were true that there was something in the character of the British colonial policy, or of the British nation, which made it wise to submit to take a share of that trade under the restrictions she thought fit to impose, and not attempt to make it her interest to adopt a more liberal policy, the objections were founded in reason. But, if this principle were once admitted, he knew not where to fix a limit to it. If she might, under this argument, without counteraction, prohibit our navigation to her West India possessions, why not also to those of the East? And why not to any of her dominions in Europe or elsewhere? Suppose France, instead of England, were concerned in this question, and that the prohibition was of our navigation to her Mediterranean ports: Is there a man who would say that we ought to consent that French vessels should bring to us the produce of the French coast on the Mediterranean, and receive our productions in return, whilst American vessels were excluded from any participation in the trade? He presumed not; and yet he saw no substantial difference between the case supposed and that which already exists, and to which this bill has reference. On general principles, Mr. L. took it for granted, that whether we do or not counteract this policy of Great Britain, was a question of expediency merely. It seemed proper to him that some countervailing measure should be adopted, to induce Great Britain to admit us to a participation in the navigation to her West India colonies, whilst she admits us to a participation in that trade.

It had been said that there was something in her navigation system to which the Government of England was so attached—that it was so fixed in the affections of the people and in the principles of the Government, that, however injurious the system to us, we ought not to enter into a contest to obtain its relaxation. Although Mr. L. did not undertake to say that we should work a change in the policy of England by either the bill or the substitute before the Committee, he could not concur in the views which had been expressed in relation to the navigation system, and he believed gentlemen were wrong in attributing to it that almost superstitious veneration said to be entertained for it by the British Government. He did not believe, he said, that the Government would find any difficulty in relaxing its policy, if it were made its apparent interest to do so. He formed his opinion less from what he had heard of the disposition of the people or of the Government, than from what he found on their statute book. If, on examination, it were found that, in order to secure articles of the first necessity, the most important principles of that system had been occasionally abandoned or changed, and that recently; if gentlemen could not show something connected with the state of this country, some difficulty not yet referred to, which will lead them to refuse to us what they have yielded to others, this objection to our acting on the subject might be completely answered. Mr. L. proceeded to cite instances of her relaxation of her navigation and colonial system from her statute book.

By an act of 1806, he said, many articles, and among them live stock, might be imported into the British West Indies from any country in America but the United States, in the vessels of such country.

By the act of 1807, masts, timber, flax, hemp, and many articles of naval equipments, might be imported into England in any vessels, although not of the country of which such articles are the produce.

As to the general attachment of the British Government to this system, the admission of importation of certain articles from every other Power but the United States, was no evidence of the mere attachment of the British people or Government to the navigation law. It was because she found that certain articles she could procure in her own vessels, others she could not, that she submitted to the principle of reciprocity in some instances, and consented to receive in the vessels of other nations what she could not get in sufficient quantity, or could not get at all, in her own. Mr. L. said he believed, too, though he had not seen the law, or a quotation from it, that she had relaxed her system in another particular. Bermuda had been declared a free port, and had been so declared in anticipation of some such measure as that now under consideration. This proved that Great Britain could, upon occasion, relax her system; though, if the House decided to be content with the little modicum of trade now carried on with the British colonies, in the vessels of that country, and to refrain from acting on the subject, there could be no doubt but that Government would show a consistency in maintaining, in relation to us, the same system which no other nation admits, and which applies to us because we alone are willing to submit to it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HOPKINSON) seemed to suppose, not that it was not in the power of that Government to relax its system, but that it was impossible for us to coerce the Government to admit us to a participation in this navigation. The ground taken by the gentleman was, that the attachment of the British Government to the navigation law was so much stronger than its attachment to the colonies, that, if the effect of the passage of this bill were never so great, its greatest effect could not shake that Government and people from a system to which they are deeply attached. The facts, Mr. L. said, which he had already stated, in regard to relaxations of the navigation system, furnished a complete answer to this argument of the blind adherence of the British Government to its navigation system.

Could any one examine the situation of the West India islands, without being satisfied that the effect of cutting them off from their ordinary supplies, must be to injure the prosperity of the mother State, and impair its commerce and navigation? The operation of the measure embraced in this bill was not that to which the gentleman referred; not that of inflicting local distress in the islands, to which the British Government would be indifferent; but, as the establishments in these islands were connected with others in the mother country, where indeed many of the proprietors resided, the result of the measure would be, Mr. L. firmly believed, to produce such an impression altogether as to require the British Government to relax its system, in one instance, as it already had done in others, to secure a general benefit. Grant that one of the islands should substitute the culture of maize for that of sugar, the effect would be, not merely a loss on the revenue to the West India planter, and to the proprietor in England, but also to the commerce of the mother country, &c.; and in thus attempting to deprive her neighbor of her fair claim to a share in a trade reciprocally advantageous, the British nation would injure its own navigation. This reasoning would show, that, if Great Britain would relax, for particular reasons, as he had shown she had done heretofore, this measure would furnish a strong inducement to her to do so, in this instance, without attributing to it coercive effects. In this latter effect of the bill, however, Mr. L. expressed no great confidence. He did not know, he said, but that the disadvantage which would result to British navigation, from the employment which an addition to our navigation (by a relaxation of her policy) would give to 2,500 American seamen, might not be sufficient to induce them to refuse to throw open the ports of colonies, important as the measure might be to them. He did not say such would be the result; but surely, if the motive of the present policy of Great Britain was to be found in the watchful jealousy of a rival Power, did it not furnish a strong argument why every measure on the part of this Government should be taken to counteract it?

Now, Mr. L. said, whether the effect of a resort to the measure before the House should be to induce Great Britain to abandon her policy; or whether, as all appeared to suppose, to make that trade a circuitous one, in either view did it not hold out sufficient inducement to us to adopt, even though it might involve some little sacrifice of other interests? For himself, he said, he did not believe, however, that from either of the systems proposed, the injury to those interests would be anything like that which gentlemen on the one hand appeared to have supposed, and on the other to have admitted.

But, Mr. L. said, he should not vote for either of the bills before the Committee, if only intended to produce a relaxation in the British system. He discriminated between the measure embraced in either of these bills, and those measures to which gentlemen had appeared to assimilate it. In doing so, he said he should vote for this measure, not merely on account of the tendency it might have to produce a relaxation of the British colonial policy, but because it must, operate as it will, produce a state of things greatly preferable to that which now exists. If indeed he were confident that this bill would not produce an abandonment of the policy it proposes to counteract, he should vote for it, on account of the partition of navigation with England which it would effect, by making the trade with the colonies circuitous. Mr. L. was anxious that the bill, or the amendment proposed to it, one or the other, should pass into a law; but he did not see an assignable reason why one of them was preferable to the other. As to the argument used by the Speaker, in opposition to the amendment, that the duties would fall on the consumers, at the first appearance of this doctrine it was some answer to say, that, whilst of one portion of the products interchanged we are the consumers, of the other we are the producers. If the principles were true, which Mr. L. by no means admitted, that the duties on that part which we consume would fall wholly on us, the duties on the other portion would fall wholly on the West India colonies. But Mr. L. did not admit, that the duties proposed would, in any material degree, fall on the consumer; since it must be evident, as he demonstrated, that the price of the articles heretofore imported from the British West Indies, in our market, must be regulated by the price at which we can import them from other quarters. If they continued to be imported, therefore, at all, the articles imported, and not the consumer, would pay the additional duty. A case might be imagined, in which they could not afford to sell, nor we to purchase; in which case the trade would be stopped altogether. The articles imported from the islands must be sold, not at the price which their merchants could afford, but, in consequence of their competition with imports of the same articles from other quarters, at the same price, after the additional duty should be imposed, at which they had sold before. But, in relation to the duty on exportation, and all the charges of it, it must fall, in a very considerable degree, on the consumers: it must do, because they purchase from us what they cannot procure anywhere else on the same terms—articles of absolute necessity. Where Great Britain can get them from other Powers, she does already; heavy duties being now laid on those articles imported from the United States. Upon the whole view of the operation of the proposed additional duties, it was evident, Mr. L. said, that the cost of transportation and the duties would fall principally on the West India colonies.

Mr. L. confessed, however, that independently of the considerations of interest which he had urged—apart from every view of detail—he found great difficulty in reconciling to his judgment the carrying on, without even an attempt to counteract it, of a trade which served exclusively the policy of another Power. If Great Britain had declared that there should be no trade between us and her colonies, it would have been proper to submit to it. But to admit it to be carried on in such ships only as she pleases, to obtain for her all the advantages of the most restrictive monopoly, might not a case occur in which it would not be proper to yield to this policy? It would be difficult to persuade him that, furnishing the articles of necessity we do, and seeing the industrious efforts of the British Government to obtain them from every other country, we ought longer to yield to it now.

In opposition to the argument in favor of this measure, drawn from its effecting a partition of the navigation with Great Britain in the trade between this country and her colonies, he had scarce heard any objection. Some gentlemen seemed to think that the effect would be merely to divert the course of trade, and promote the growth of the English Northern colonies, and that it would not lead to a free trade; to which idea the establishment of a free port gave an air of probability. But Mr. L. had no apprehension of it. The policy of the mother country as to the colonies was matured and settled: whatever encouragement could be given to her North American colonies in this respect, without great hazard, had been already given; and everything had been already drawn from that quarter for the supply of the West Indies, that could be, except at such a price as would destroy cultivation in the West Indies. They had already been so much fostered, that it was not probable that greater encouragement could be given them. Mr. L. said he was not sure that it entered into the national policy of England to encourage the growth of our Northern frontier in preference to that of our Southern, which would be the effect of forcing the colonies to obtain their supplies, as far as practicable, through the St. Lawrence. On the contrary, he believed she had more to fear from the augmentation of our strength in that quarter than any other; and that anything like a naval force on the Lakes would be regarded by her with at least as much alarm as on the Atlantic. He did not believe they could draw greater supplies than they now do from the Northern provinces; but, if it were otherwise, it was not the policy of the British Government to add to our strength on the Lakes, even by weakening it on the Atlantic.

In every view of the subject, Mr. L. was in favor of the passage of this bill, in one or the other of the forms offered to the Committee.

Mr. HOPKINSON said, that the gentleman had mistaken him when he had supposed him to have said that it was not in the power of this Government to induce the British Government to abandon its policy in excluding us from a participation in the trade with its colonies. That, Mr. H. said, was not the question before the Committee, and, when the House had honored him with their attention, it had been his endeavor to confine himself to the question. He indulged in no speculative opinions. The inquiry was, solely, whether the measure before the Committee would have that effect. The course of my argument, said Mr. H. was this: I placed myself on the premises of the Speaker—I assumed his position, and used his redoubts. Agreeing with him in his premises, I thought upon his own grounds a sufficient answer could be given to the honorable Speaker. The ground assumed by the Speaker was, that the navigation system was the first object of the British national policy; that her prosperity and the continuance of her power was considered so intimately connected with it, that it was the corner-stone of her strength, the feeder of the lamp of her national glory. The question was, whether either of the measures before the House was of a nature likely to reach the subject. The gentleman had said that any feeling of the colonies was beside the mark; that the British Ministry would not dare to move a stone of this edifice till the public will should demand it. Assuming those grounds, Mr. H. said, he had endeavored to show the House that a measure directed against a small amount of colonial trade would not overcome such towering obstacles; that, when you desire to remove a mountain, you should not apply your force to a molehill; that when a great policy is to be changed, it is idle to begin at the little West India trade.

Thus much in explanation. But, whilst up, he would turn his attention to the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina. He knew, he said, that when he attacked the arguments of that gentleman, he was in danger of falling into error himself. On the present occasion, however, he thought the gentleman was himself in error. The ground of the Speaker was, that the navigation (not the colonial) system of Great Britain was one in respect to which the nation was more attached than to any part of their policy; that it was rooted in the national heart—and drew the conclusion, that to effect a change in a sentiment so deeply rooted, we ought to attack the nation at its extremities! Now, the gentleman from South Carolina, to show that the Speaker's premises were unfounded, and that the British nation was not so superstitiously attached to the system as the Speaker had supposed, brought forward instances in which she relaxed from the rigor of her system. If, said Mr. H., I understand the gentleman's instances, they prove directly the reverse of the inference he wished to draw from them, and sustain more firmly the position occupied by the Speaker and myself. Our position is, that the navigation system is the darling of the British nation: the gentleman from South Carolina speaks of the colonial system, and blends them together as if they were one and the same. But they are not. The colonial system, Mr. H. said, in the instances referred to, had been made to yield—to what? To the navigation system, to which commerce was made subordinate. Strictly speaking, on the colonial system, the British Government would insist on the produce of its colonies being carried first to England; but they permitted it to come direct to this country; and here was a relaxation of the colonial policy. How did they permit it to come here? In British vessels, navigated by British seamen. This went to show that the colonial and every other interest was made to bend to the production of ships and seamen. By permitting their produce to be brought here directly, and confining their trade to their own vessels, they extended their shipping, and increased their seamen; and that being their policy, this exception, as it was called, proved the rule; the commercial part of the colonial system was made to yield to the navigation system. But the House had been told that in 1807 an act had been passed by the British Parliament permitting articles of a certain description to be imported into England in other vessels than those of the country producing them. If we did not look at the articles, said Mr. H., this would be a good argument; but look at the articles, and it goes to strengthen our ground. They were, he said, articles of the first necessity, (masts, lumber, hemp, cordage, &c.,) things essential to the construction and maintenance of the Navy. When, therefore, Great Britain had relaxed one part of her navigation system, it was to favor another; when she had given away something, it was to get something more. This instance, also mentioned as an exception, was a sacrifice of the interests of commerce to those of navigation. She had given on one hand, to make more on the other. The other instances, also, Mr. H. contended, went to sustain his argument. Was there any instance, he asked, in which this system had been relaxed, except in relation to itself; except where some small advantage had been surrendered to gain a greater another way? Was there any instance in which the navigation system had been made materially to bend to commerce? He believed not.

Do we not deceive ourselves, said Mr. H., in regard to the strength of this necessity on which we rely? The argument is, that Great Britain is dependent on us for articles of the first necessity. I know, sir, that this was a theory very much cherished some time ago amongst us. But, however convenient the trade of this country in that respect to the West India islands, since they might obtain certain articles here better, from our proximity, than anywhere else; to say that they are wholly dependent on us for articles of the first necessity was, he said, in the face of the experience of the last ten years. We had set out on the starving system with a great deal of courage, but not with much success. Our measures might, for the time, have raised the prices of the articles they used to get from us, and of their production to us; but it had been proved that the necessity for our supplies was not indispensable. He had heard of no individual starved there, or any great evil the people in the Islands had sustained; and yet, that we had prohibitory laws as strict as we ever could have, no one would deny. The result is, said he, in conclusion, that your laws of this description cannot be executed; or, if executed, that they cannot produce the effect calculated on from them. The West Indies were either furnished without our supplies, or our supplies reached them in spite of all we could do.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the substitute for the bill, proposed by Mr. FORSYTH, and negatived—ayes 30.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, renewed his motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said, if a majority of the Committee was opposed to acting on this subject, he thought it would be better not to express that disposition in the form now proposed. A postponement of the subject might produce a different impression. It would be extremely unfortunate, Mr. C. remarked, if we should say at once to Great Britain, by the rejection of this bill, that we mean to acquiesce in her policy in this respect.

Mr. JACKSON said, that the decision of this question would be by no means decisive in regard to the disposition of the House to resist the British system. It might so happen, that the bill would fail in consequence of a difference of opinion between the two systems of duties or exclusion; that a majority of the House may concur in the general sentiment in favor of some provision, but that they may not unite in opinion as to the nature of that provision. If the amendment now proposed should prevail, it would be competent to the gentleman from Georgia to renew in the House his proposition, and then the whole subject might be postponed indefinitely. At the next session it might be more deliberately taken up, and this or some other course be pursued. As to guarding against Great Britain's understanding of our opinion on this subject, said he, I apprehend it would be labor in vain: that she will as well understand the difficulty of our legislation in consequence of the diversity of opinion, if the bill be postponed, as if it be rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, wished the gentleman to permit the bill to pass to the House. Mr. S. added a few words respecting our exports to the colonies. If the bill passed, the colonies would be compelled, absolutely, to get their naval stores from us, and the navigation employed in carrying them was not inconsiderable. If they were compelled to get them from the mother country, they must go hence to the mother country. These articles of indispensable necessity constituted a considerable portion, not far from half, of the six millions of our exports to the British West India colonies. Mr. S. said, he should vote against striking out the first section of the bill, preferring postponement, as not showing the same determination to submit to the British policy in this respect.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said that, under existing circumstances, he thought it best not to act definitively on this subject. He should vote against striking out the first section of the bill, that it might be reported to the House, and laid on the table, with a view to wait such further information as may be received at this or the next Congress, when the subject may be resumed, but with the understanding that it should not be taken up unless further information should be received. It would then be left in the situation which he understood to be the wish of the majority, without being decided in one way or the other.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, expressed his sentiments on the subject. He considered the measure proposed in the bill, as one of perfect justice, which he hoped would be definitively acted on. He was sorry, he said, to hear some remarks which had been made in debate, calculated to produce an impression on the mind of the British Government, that we would do the thing if we dare—for that was the amount of the argument—that we ought to calculate the costs, that Great Britain never would recede, &c. Mr. W. said, he was sure she never would relax her policy, until it was made by this country her interest to do so. He had been gratified by the observations of his friend from South Carolina, which had shed a light that had dissipated all doubts on the subject. This was the time, if ever there was one, when Great Britain could be induced to relax her policy, owing to the scarcity of breadstuffs. He took occasion to say that he despised the Administration of England and their conduct, but he had no hostility to the people. He had forborne, he said, early in the debate, from speaking on this subject, because he did not understand it as well as the commercial men in the House. But, as his colleague and the gentleman from South Carolina had given so luminous a view of the subject, so far from its wanting a majority, he hoped the bill would pass by an overwhelming majority. And why not? It had been said it would not be effectual in producing a relaxation of the navigation system. Mr. W. said, he was of a different opinion. It would starve the colonies, sow the seeds of rebellion among them, &c., and compel the Government to relax or lose them. He expatiated further on the reasonableness of this measure, and its probable efficacy.

Mr. JACKSON, in consequence of the urgent request of several of his friends, withdrew his motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

The bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE NAVIGATION BILL.

The Committee then took up the bill concerning the navigation of the United States, which having considered and amended, the Committee rose, and reported both bills with amendments.

In regard to the first of these bills, a motion was made by Mr. SHEFFEY to postpone it indefinitely.

But a motion, by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to lay the bill on the table, finally prevailed.

The House then took up the second bill, as amended, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, by the addition of several new sections.

Several amendments were proposed, which gave rise to considerable conversational debate, particularly one moved by Mr. FORSYTH, to require that the fishing vessels, on which a bounty is paid by the United States, should be manned by a crew wholly composed (instead of three-fourths, as proposed by the bill,) of American citizens. The question was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 71, nays 71, as follows:

The bill was finally amended so as to bring it into the following shape:

A Bill concerning the Navigation of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the first day of September, no goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens, or subjects, of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt, a similar regulation of commerce.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, or merchandise, imported into the United States contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and the ship or vessel wherein the same shall be imported, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; and such goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, and cargo, shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in the same manner, and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions, as have been heretofore established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States by the several revenue laws.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, after the 30th day of September next, the bounties and allowances now allowed by law, to the owners of boats or vessels, engaged in the fisheries, shall be paid only on boats or vessels, the crews of which, or at least seven-eighths thereof, shall be proved to the satisfaction of the collector of the district, where such boat or vessel shall belong, to be citizens of the United States, or persons not the subjects of any foreign Prince or State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be imported, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port in the United States to another port of the United States, in a vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject of any foreign Power; but this clause shall not be construed to prohibit the sailing of any foreign vessel from one port of the United States to another port in the same States: Provided, no goods, wares, or merchandise, are taken in such vessel from one port of the United States to be landed in another port of the same States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, after the 30th day of September next, there shall be paid a duty of fifty cents per ton upon every ship or vessel of the United States, which shall be entered in a district in one State from a district in another State, except it be an adjoining State on the seacoast, or on a navigable river or lake, and except, also, it be a coasting vessel going from Long Island, in the State of New York, to the State of Rhode Island, or from the State of Rhode Island to the said Long Island, having on board goods, wares, and merchandise, taken in one State to be delivered in another State. Provided, That it shall not be made on any ship or vessel having a license to trade between the different districts of the United States, or to carry on the bank or whale fisheries, more than once a year: And provided also, That if the owner of any such vessel, or his agent, shall prove, to the satisfaction of the collector, that three-fourths at least of the crew thereof, are American citizens, or persons not the subjects of any foreign Prince or State, the duty to be paid in such case shall be only at the rate of six cents per ton; but nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal or effect any exemption from tonnage duty given by the eighth section of the act, entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of certain districts," and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes."

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, after the 30th day of September next, there shall be paid upon every ship or vessel of the United States, which shall be entered in the United States, from any foreign port or place, the same tonnage duty which would be payable by a vessel belonging to the State or country to which such foreign port or place belong: Provided, however, That if the owner of such ship or vessel shall prove, to the satisfaction of the collector, that two-thirds at least of the crew are American citizens, or persons not the subjects of any foreign Prince or State, the duty to be paid in such case shall be only at the rate of six cents per ton: And, provided also, That this section shall not extend to ships or vessels of the United States, which are now on foreign voyages, until after their return to some port of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the several bounties and remissions, or abatements of duty, allowed by this act, in the case of vessels having a certain proportion of seamen who are American citizens, or persons not the subjects of any foreign Power, shall be allowed only in the case of vessels having such proportion of American seamen during their whole voyage, unless in case of sickness, death, or desertion, or where the whole or part of the crew shall have been taken prisoners in the voyage.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without opposition, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 3.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of "The Pennsylvania Society for promoting the abolition of slavery, the relief of free negroes unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African race," praying that further measures may be adopted for the protection of the rights of free negroes.—Referred to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the African slave trade.

Mr. DARLINGTON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Pennsylvania, complaining of the many and great impositions to which they are subjected, in consequence of the number of unjust, absurd, and frivolous patents, which have been granted to a set of speculators, and praying that additional restrictions may be imposed on the issuing of patents.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which have been referred the petitions of Samuel Black; the heirs of George Nebinger, deceased; John Dent; John Armstrong; Maria S. Tyson; Nancy Armon; Sylvanus Townsend; and Asa Lyon; reported a bill, authorizing the payment of the principal and interest due on the loan office certificates therein named; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter, deceased.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Indiana," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. YANCEY, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the duty imposed on foreign spirits.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills from this House of the following titles, to wit: "An act to explain the act to authorize certain officers, and other persons, to administer oaths," approved May the 3d, 1798, with amendments; "An act directing the discharge of William Smith from imprisonment;" "An act making an appropriation to enable the President of the United States to hold treaties with the Indian tribes, for the purpose therein mentioned;" "An act providing for the division of certain quarter-sections in future sales of the public lands;" and "An act for the relief of John Haslett;" in which amendments and bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The engrossed bill "concerning the navigation of the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, in relation to discriminating duties on British vessels and their cargoes; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin, deceased," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.

Mr. YANCEY, from the same committee, made detailed reports on the petitions of Peter Caslard, Jumonville de Villiers, Madame Montreuil, John de Castanado, James H. Boisgervais, and Antoine Bienvenue; which said reports were severally read; when Mr. Y. reported the following bills, to wit: A bill for the relief of Peter Caslard; a bill for the relief of Jumonville de Villiers; a bill for the relief of Madame Montreuil; a bill for the relief of John de Castanado; a bill for the relief of Antoine Bienvenue; and a bill for the relief of James H. Boisgervais: which said bills were severally read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.

REPORTS ON VARIOUS CLAIMS.

The reports in the cases of Villiers, Montreuil, Bienvenue, and Castanado, are as follows:

[Report on the case of Jumonville de Villiers.]

That, in the months of December, 1814, and January, 1815, the American troops called to the defence of New Orleans, and commanded by General Andrew Jackson, were stationed on the plantation of the petitioner; that, while so stationed there, it became necessary to use for fuel, for the use of the troops, a quantity of fencing, and the petitioner requests of Congress to pay him the value thereof, and also the value of a quantity of sugar cane and sugar, which he states were used by the troops of the United States.

The committee are of opinion, that the fencing having been made use of for fuel, which could not have been procured of the ordinary kind, from the nature of the service, and the circumstances under which the troops were collected for the defence of New Orleans, the claimant is entitled to relief, so far as respects the value of the fence, but that the Government cannot be considered liable for the destruction of the cane or use of the sugar, it being neither necessary for the service nor for the sustenance of the army. Pursuant to this opinion they report a bill, authorizing payment for the fence only.

That the petitioner owned a plantation situated below New Orleans, which was occupied by the American army in 1814 and 1815, and upon which public works for the defence of the country were erected; that, in consequence of such occupation, and the erection of a line of public works through the plantation, it has received considerable injury, and would cost a considerable sum to place it in the same situation it was in before its occupation.

The committee are of opinion the petitioner is entitled to relief, and therefore report a bill.

[Report on the case of Antoine Bienvenue.]

That the claimant was owner of an elegant and well furnished house situated below the city of New Orleans, and between the positions occupied by the American and British armies in December, 1814, and January, 1815. In consequence of this situation of the house and the two armies, it afforded a shelter to the British army, and was, by General Jackson, ordered to be fired on with hot shot for its destruction. It was several times fired on by Commodore Patterson and set fire to, which was extinguished by the British forces. In consequence of the destruction of the house and furniture, and other houses adjacent to the dwelling-house, the petitioner has sustained considerable injury, for which he prays Congress to remunerate him.

The committee are of opinion he is entitled to relief, and therefore report a bill for that purpose.

[Report on the case of John de Castanado.]

That the petitioner owned a plantation and house situated on the right bank of the Mississippi, below New Orleans, and that a battery was erected, by order of the commanding officer, in front of the house, and close by it; in consequence of which the house received much injury from the British artillery. The petitioner had also a quantity of wood and hay taken from him and used by the army, for which he requests that he may be paid.

It appearing to the satisfaction of the committee that the house and plantation of the petitioner were injured in consequence of their occupation for military purposes, and that the wood and hay were necessarily used for the army, they are of opinion the petitioner is entitled to relief, and therefore report a bill to that effect.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. HARRISON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary to the Constitution of the United States, to enable the Government thereof to adopt such a system of military instruction and discipline for the militia, as to make it a safe and effectual national defence.

The House having agreed, by a small majority, to consider the resolution—

Mr. H. entered into an explanation of his reasons for offering the motion, and referred to the Constitution, to show that Congress had no power to call out the militia for the purpose of training them, or to grant a dollar to defray the expense for that object. Mr. H. concluded by saying, that he believed, without adopting some such course, all hope of training the militia might be abandoned, &c.

Mr. PICKERING opposed the resolution, and spoke against its object. He was of opinion that the militia could never be disciplined without placing a part periodically on the footing of regular soldiers, and that idea he had long abandoned. He thought the General Government ought to be satisfied with arming and regimenting the militia, and then leave their discipline to the States; that the present attempts to train them were attended with great expense; and that the people would never consent to place the great power contemplated by this motion in the hands of the Executive. Mr. P. took this occasion to dispute what has been frequently advanced, that General WASHINGTON had approved the plan submitted to Congress, in 1790, by General Knox, then Secretary of War, but that General WASHINGTON had simply sent it to Congress, without expressing either approbation or disapprobation.

Mr. HARRISON replied to Mr. PICKERING's remarks, and referred to documents and other testimony, to establish the fact, that the plan for classing and disciplining the militia drawn up by General Knox had been sanctioned by the judgment of General WASHINGTON; and said further, as to the popularity of the motion, he was ready to take it on himself, and was willing his popularity should be sacrificed in attempting to accomplish an object of such vital importance to the country, &c.

The resolution was, on motion of Mr. YANCEY, laid on the table.

BANKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call over the orders of the day; when

Mr. LEWIS moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole, on the bills to incorporate certain banking institutions in this District.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the indefinite postponement of those bills; but, on the suggestion of the SPEAKER, as the proper way of getting at his object, Mr. R. varied his motion to a discharge of the Committee of the Whole, from the further consideration of the bills mentioned. Mr. R. then entered into a wide discussion of the expediency of authorizing additional banks, as at present conducted, condemning the policy pursued by the Government on this subject already, and against chartering other companies for the issue of paper, without probably a dollar of capital, &c. Mr. R. spoke nearly an hour, in his usual diffuse and desultory manner.

Mr. LEWIS replied, that the object of the bill was mistaken, for it was to make the banks about to be chartered pay specie, instead of authorizing them not to do it; and said the very bank now under consideration had more specie in its vaults, in proportion to its capital, than any bank South of Philadelphia; that this District had less bank capital, in proportion to its population, than any city in the neighboring States, and he could see no reason for refusing them charters, &c.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied, and spoke again at great length.

Mr. SHEFFEY replied at great length, to what he termed Mr. RANDOLPH's discourses on matters and things in general, and supported the incorporation of the companies praying charters, as demanded by justice and impartiality, as well as other considerations.

Mr. RANDOLPH rejoined, and entered again into a general review.

Mr. HERBERT spoke at some length in favor of granting the charters; and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH spoke at some length in favor of the postponement.

Messrs. CALHOUN, ROSS, and DESHA, made some remarks on questions introduced by Mr. RANDOLPH, unconnected with the bills before the House.

The motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole, from the further consideration of the bills referred to, was taken and carried.

The question then recurred on the other branch of the motion, viz., to postpone the bills indefinitely.

Mr. PETER rose to oppose the motion, and to reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, but the question being already taken on one division of the question, it was considered not to be in order to debate the remaining branch of it at this stage of the business.

After some conversation, the question on the indefinite postponement of the bills was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 64, as follows:

TUESDAY, February 4.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which have been referred the petitions of the manufacturers of umbrellas in Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, and the petition of sundry merchants and coppersmiths in Boston, made a report thereon; which was read, and the resolution therein contained, was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners, who ask that "plate, braziers' and still copper" be exempt from duty, ought not to be granted.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the same committee, made a report on the inquiry they were instructed to make, into the expediency of educating, at the Military Academy at West Point, the sons of those officers and soldiers who have fallen in battle, while in the service of the United States.

[The report states that the committee have considered the subject, and have instructed their chairman, when the bill for establishing additional Military Academies shall come up, to move an amendment thereto, embracing the object above mentioned.]

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made a report respecting the amount of capital employed in trade with the Indians, which was read; when, Mr. T. reported a bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to exclude foreigners from a participation therein; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill for the relief of certain sufferers during the late war, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the said bill be committed to the Committee of the whole House on the bill for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers.

The bill from the Senate making an appropriation to enable the President of the United States to hold treaties with the Indian tribes for the purpose therein mentioned, was read twice and committed to a select committee; and Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. McLEAN, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. HERBERT, and Mr. CADY, were appointed the committee.

The bill from the Senate, providing for the division of certain quarter sections in future sales of the public lands, was read twice and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John Haslett, was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to explain the act to authorize certain officers and other persons to administer oaths, approved May 3d, 1793," were read and agreed to.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

Mr. W. P. MACLAY presented a petition from sundry manufacturers of iron, in the county of Huntingdon and State of Pennsylvania, praying that additional duties may be imposed on iron imported into the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of New York, on behalf of the domestic manufactures within the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK also presented a similar petition from the merchants of the said city of New York; which were, respectively, referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.—The last named memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled :

The memorial of the merchants of the city of New York respectfully represents :

That your memorialists, witnessing the sinking condition of the commercial interests of our country, have, upon investigating the causes, been led to the full conviction that nothing short of the protecting arm of the Government can rescue it from that ruin to which it is rapidly approaching.

That, since the peace in Europe, the interdiction of European manufactures on the European continent, conspiring with other causes which we shall notice, has not only occasioned our markets to be glutted to an alarming degree, but has arrested trade from its best and accustomed channels, and given it a direction which, if pursued, must inevitably ultimate in the ruin of the mercantile establishments of our country.

Sympathy and patriotism combine to induce us, while on this subject, to speak also in behalf of the manufacturing interest of the nation. The same causes which are operating the destruction of our commercial prosperity are fast precipitating our manufacturing brethren to the abyss of ruin. The fate of the one is necessarily involved in that of the other, and the destiny of the nation inseparably interwoven with the welfare of both.

It is a lamentable fact, that our laws operate to give fugitive commercial agents advantages in this country, which, independent of fraudulent dealing, transfers the trade of our country into the hands of transitory strangers, enables them to monopolize the market, drive our merchants from business, and arrest the industry of our manufacturers.

It is the practice of the foreign merchant to ship his goods to this country, invoiced at very reduced prices, to one of his agents here, who, having entered them, delivers them for sale to the hands of another agent, who is furnished with the true invoice. The owner is beyond the reach of our laws. He who enters them affects to know nothing of them, but through the medium of the invoice he receives. He who holds the true invoice has no agency in their entry. Thus, they all elude the penalties of the law; and the revenue, the merchant, and the manufacturer, become the common victims of foreign frauds.

Added to this, sales at auction are excessively hostile to our mercantile and manufacturing interests. This mode of sale, besides affording to foreign agents an early harvest of the fruits of their frauds, gives to them advantages in which the regular merchant cannot participate—advantages which are prohibited to them in their own country, the wise policy of which interdicts (except in a few instances) all sales at auction, owing to their evil effects on the mercantile and manufacturing interests. By this mode of sale, the fair merchant is stripped of all the advantages which a necessary establishment, large expenditures, and a long course of honorable dealing, had acquired to him; whilst strangers, bound by no ties to this country; who bear none of its burdens; who perform no civil duties, nor any service, in peace or war; who are at no expense, either of house-keeping, store-rent, or clerk-hire; who are so transitory as scarcely to be amenable to our laws;—are enabled to monopolize our money and our markets, by which means our merchants are obliged, in many instances, to sacrifice their goods through the same channel, in order to pay their bonds for duties to the Government, and many are induced in moments of distress to raise money by sales at auction, and, by thus concealing their insolvent circumstances for a time, involve themselves and their benefactors in ruin.

It is too often the case that one foreign agent is admitted to become security for another, for duties which they never intended to pay; and any probable sacrifice at auction is met by the countervailing act of absconding and leaving their bonds unpaid.

With respect to the manufacturing interests of our country, your memorial think proper to observe, that, when the aggressions of Great Britain made an appeal to arms necessary, the nation found itself dependent on the enemy, even for the munitions of war and the clothing of our armies.

The procurement of these essential supplies led to an illicit trade, which not only drained us of our specie, but tended to extinguish patriotism, demoralize the people, and degrade our national character. The necessities of the nation then called for domestic manufactures as the only remedy for evils so great; and adventurous and patriotic individuals, relying on the permanent protection which they were led to believe that Government would afford to domestic industry, embarked largely in manufacturing establishments, inasmuch that the capital vested in machinery, buildings, and carrying on two branches of our manufactures, alone, amounted to $100,000,000.

It is admitted that the National Legislature, at its last session, bestowed upon this subject a wise and liberal consideration, and granted such encouragement as was by many then deemed sufficient, but which has since proved inadequate.

If England, before her manufactures were excluded from the European markets, was willing to encounter immense voluntary losses in the hope of destroying our infant manufactures by glutting our market, how much more animated must her efforts now be to preserve to herself the only legal market which the wise policy of the European Powers has left to her? But, notwithstanding all those disadvantages, we are confident, that, if our Government will continue to make this branch of domestic industry an object of its solicitude; if it shall be understood, both at home and abroad, that it is never to be abandoned or deserted—the struggle will not be long—we shall become able to compete with the full power of our adversary; our capitalists will no longer be retrained by the fear, and foreigners no longer fed with the hope, of our ruin.

Adverting to the means necessary for the protection of our manufacturing and mercantile interests, your memorialists beg leave respectfully to suggest the following as measures which will not only prove conducive to that end, but operate beneficially on the interest and prosperity of the nation at large :

1. That the duties imposed on foreign fabrics by the tariff at the last session of Congress, instead of being limited to two years, be made permanent.
2. That the importation of cotton goods manufactured beyond the Cape of Good Hope be prohibited.
3. That the revenue laws be revised, and so modified as to exclude foreigners from becoming sureties for duties, and to prevent smuggling, false invoices, and other frauds on the revenue.
4. That a duty of 10 per cent. be laid on all foreign goods sold at auction, with the exception of estates of American bankrupts and insolvents, persons deceased, and sheriffs and marshals' sales.

5. That it be recommended to the officers of the Army and Navy, and to all civil officers of the United States, to use American fabrics.

And your memorialists further request such aid and protection as will prevent the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the nation from becoming victims to that foreign policy and influence which is working their destruction.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

And 173 others.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. CULPEPER moved to postpone the intervening orders of the day for the purpose of again taking up Mr. PICKENS's propositions to amend the Constitution, which were under discussion some weeks ago.

The motion was supported by the mover, and also by Mr. PICKENS, who thought the subject had been so fully debated that every member was prepared to vote on the question, and he wished the subject to be taken up, that it might be decided on at once.

The House, however, refused to go into the consideration of the resolution—ayes 59, noes 73.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House, on motion of Mr. CALHOUN, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvement, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States share of its dividends.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and observed, that it seemed to be the fate of some measures to be praised, but not adopted. Such, he feared, would be the fate of that on which we are now deliberating. From the indisposition manifested by the House to go into committee on the bill, there was not much prospect of its success; yet it seemed to him, when he reflected how favorable was the present moment, and how confessedly important a good system of roads and canals was to our country, he might reasonably be very sanguine of success. At peace with all the world, abounding in pecuniary means, and, what was of the most importance, and at what he rejoiced, as most favorable to the country, party and sectional feelings immersed in a liberal and enlightened regard to the general concerns of the nation—such, said he, are the favorable circumstances under which we are now deliberating. Thus situated, to what can we direct our resources and attention more important than internal improvements? What can add more to the wealth, the strength, and the political prosperity of our country? The manner in which facility and cheapness of intercourse, added to the wealth of a nation, had been so often and ably discussed by writers on political economy, that he presumed the House to be perfectly acquainted with the subject. It was sufficient to observe that every branch of national industry—agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial—was greatly stimulated and rendered by it more productive. The result is, said he, that it tends to diffuse universal opulence. It gives to the interior the advantages possessed by the parts most eligibly situated for trade. It makes the country price, whether in the sale of the raw product or in the purchase of the articles for consumption, approximate to that of the commercial towns. In fact, if we look into the nature of wealth, we will find that nothing can be more favorable to its growth than good roads and canals. An article, to command a price, must not only be useful, but must be the subject of demand; and the better the means of commercial intercourse the larger is the sphere of demand. The truth of these positions, said Mr. C., is obvious, and has been tested by all countries where the experiment has been made. It has particularly been strikingly exemplified in England, and if the result there, in a country so limited and so similar in its products, has been to produce a most uncommon state of opulence, what may we not expect from the same cause in our country, abounding as it does in the greatest variety of products, and presenting the greatest facility for improvements? Let it not be said that internal improvements may be wholly left to the enterprise of the States and of individuals. He knew, he said, that much might justly be expected to be done by them; but in a country so new and so extensive as ours, there is room enough, said he, for all the General and State governments and individuals, in which to exert their resources. But many of the improvements contemplated, said Mr. C., are on too great a scale for the resources of the States or individuals; and many of such a nature, that the rival jealousy of the States, if left alone, might prevent. They required the resources and the general superintendence of this Government to effect and complete them.

But, said Mr. C., there are higher and more powerful considerations why Congress ought to take charge of this subject. If we were only to consider the pecuniary advantages of a good system of roads and canals, it might indeed admit of some doubt whether they ought not to be left wholly to individual exertions; but when we come to consider how intimately the strength and political prosperity of the Republic are connected with this subject, we find the most urgent reasons why we should apply our resources to them. In many respects, no country of equal population and wealth possesses equal materials of power with ours. The people, in muscular power, in hardy and enterprising habits, and in a lofty and gallant courage, are surpassed by none. In one respect, and, in my opinion, in one only, are we materially weak. We occupy a surface prodigiously great in proportion to our numbers. The common strength is brought to bear with great difficulty on the point that may be menaced by an enemy. It is our duty, then, as far as in the nature of things it can be effected, to counteract this weakness. Good roads and canals judiciously laid out, are the proper remedy. In the recent war, how much did we suffer for the want of them! Besides the tardiness and the consequential inefficacy of our military movements, to what an increased expense was the country put for the article of transportation alone ! In the event of another war, the saving in this particular would go far towards indemnifying us for the expense of constructing the means of transportation.

It is not, however, in this respect only, that roads and canals add to the strength of the country. Our power of raising revenue, in war particularly, depends, said he, mainly on them. In peace our revenue depends principally on the imports; in war this source, in a great measure, fails, and internal taxes, to a great amount, become necessary. Unless the means of commercial intercourse are rendered much more perfect than they now are, we shall never be able in war to raise the necessary supplies. If taxes were collected in kind, if, for instance, the farmer and mechanic paid in their surplus produce, then the difficulty would not exist, as, in no country on earth, is there so great a surplus, in proportion to its population, as in ours. But such a system of taxes is impossible. They must be paid in money; and, by the Constitution, must be laid uniformly. What, then, is the effect? The taxes are raised in every part of this extensive country, uniformly; but the expenditure must, in its nature, be principally confined to the scene of military operations. This drains the circulating medium from one part and accumulates it in another, and perhaps a very distant one. The result, said he, is obvious. Unless it can return through the operation of trade, the parts from which the constant drain takes place must ultimately be impoverished. Commercial intercourse is the true remedy to this weakness; and the means by which that is to be effected, are roads, canals, and the coasting trade. On these, combined with domestic manufactures, does the moneyed capacity of this country, in war, depend. Without them, not only will we be unable to raise the necessary supplies, but the currency of the country must necessarily fall into the greatest disorder—such as we lately experienced.

But on this subject of national power, what, said Mr. C., can be more important than a perfect unity in every part, in feelings and sentiments? And what can tend more powerfully to produce it, than overcoming the effects of distance? No country, enjoying freedom, ever occupied anything like as great an extent of country as this Republic. One hundred years ago, the most profound philosophers did not believe it to be even possible. They did not suppose it possible that a pure Republic could exist on as great a scale even as the island of Great Britain. What then was considered as chimerical, said Mr. C., we now have the felicity to enjoy; and, what is most remarkable, such is the happy mould of our Government, so well are the State and general powers blended, that much of our political happiness draws its origin from the extent of our Republic. It has exempted us from most of the causes which distracted the small Republics of antiquity. Let it not, however, be forgotten, let it, said he, be forever kept in mind, that it exposes us to the greatest of all calamities, next to the loss of liberty, and even to that in its consequence—disunion. We are great, and rapidly—he was about to say fearfully—growing. This, said he, is our pride and danger—our weakness and our strength. Little, said Mr. C., does he deserve to be intrusted with the liberties of this people, who does not raise his mind to these truths. We are under the most imperious obligation to counteract every tendency to disunion. The strongest of all cements is, undoubtedly, the wisdom, justice, and, above all, the moderation of this House; yet the great subject on which we are now deliberating, in this respect, deserves the most serious consideration. Whatever, said Mr. C., impedes the intercourse of the extremes with this, the centre of the Republic, weakens the Union. The more enlarged the sphere of commercial circulation, the more extended that of social intercourse; the more strongly are we bound together; the more inseparable are our destinies. Those who understand the human heart best, know how powerfully distance tends to break the sympathies of our nature. Nothing, not even dissimilarity of language, tends more to estrange man from man. Let us then, said Mr. C., bind the Republic together with a perfect system of roads and canals. Let us conquer space. It is thus the most distant parts of the Republic will be brought within a few days travel of the centre; it is thus that a citizen of the West will read the news of Boston still moist from the press. The mail and the press, said he, are the nerves of the body politic. By them the slightest impression made on the most remote parts is communicated to the whole system; and the more perfect the means of transportation, the more rapid and true the vibration. To aid us in this great work, to maintain the integrity of this Republic, we inhabit a country presenting the most admirable advantages. Belted around, as it is, by lakes and oceans, intersected in every direction by bays and rivers, the hand of industry and art is tempted to improvement. So situated, said he, blessed with a form of Government at once combining liberty and strength, we may reasonably raise our eyes to a most splendid future, if we only act in a manner worthy of our advantages. If, however, neglecting them, we permit a low, sordid, selfish, and sectional spirit to take possession of this House, this happy scene will vanish. We will divide, and in its consequences will follow misery and despotism.

To legislate for our country, said Mr. C., requires not only the most enlarged views, but a species of self-devotion not exacted in any other. In a country so extensive, and so various in its interests, what is necessary for the common good, may apparently be opposed to the interest of particular sections. It must be submitted to as the condition of our greatness. But were we a small Republic, were we confined to the ten miles' square, the selfish instincts of our nature might in most cases be relied on in the management of public affairs.

Such, then, being the obvious advantages of internal improvements, why, said Mr. C., should the House hesitate to commence the system? He understood there were, with some members, Constitutional objections. The power of Congress is objected to—first, that they have none to cut a road or canal through a State without its consent; and next, that the public moneys can only be appropriated to effect the particular powers enumerated in the Constitution. The first of these objections, it is plain, does not apply to this bill. No particular road or canal is proposed to be cut through any State. The bill simply appropriates money to the general purpose of improving the means of communication. When a bill is introduced to apply the money to a particular object in any State, then, and not till then, will the question be fairly before us. Mr. C. gave no opinion on this point. In fact, he scarcely thought it worth the discussion, since the good sense of the States might be relied on. They will in all cases readily yield their assent. The fear is in a different direction; in a too great solicitude to obtain an undue share to be expended within their respective limits. In fact, he said he understood that this was not the objection insisted on. It was mainly urged that the Congress can only apply the public money in execution of the enumerated powers. He was no advocate for refined arguments on the Constitution. The instrument was not intended as a thesis for the logician to exercise his ingenuity on. It ought to be construed with plain, good sense; and what can be more express than the Constitution on this very point? The first power delegated to Congress is comprised in these words: "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises: to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." First—the power is given to lay taxes; next, the objects are enumerated to which the money accruing from the exercise of this power may be applied; to pay the debts, provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare; and last, the rule for laying the taxes is prescribed—that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform. If the framers had intended to limit the use of the money to the powers afterwards enumerated and defined, nothing could be more easy than to have expressed it plainly. He knew it was the opinion of some, that the words "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," which he had just cited, were not intended to be referred to, the power of laying taxes, contained in the first part of the section, but that they are to be understood as distinct and independent powers, granted in general terms; and are gratified by a more detailed enumeration of powers in the subsequent part of the Constitution. If such were in fact the meaning, surely nothing can be conceived more bungling and awkward than the manner in which the framers have communicated their intention. If it were their intention to make a summary of the powers of Congress in general terms, which were afterwards to be particularly defined and enumerated, they should have told us so plainly and distinctly; and if the words "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," were intended for this summary, they should have headed the list of our powers, and it should have been stated, that to effect these general objects, the following specific powers were granted. He asked the members to read the section with attention, and it would, he conceived, plainly appear that such could not be the intention. The whole section seemed to him to be about taxes. It plainly commenced and ended with it, and nothing could be more strained than to suppose the intermediate words "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," were to be taken as independent and distinct powers.—Forced, however, as such a construction was, he might admit it, and urge that the words do constitute a part of the enumerated powers. The Constitution, said he, gives to Congress the power to establish post offices and post roads. He knew the interpretation which was usually given to these words confined our power to that of designating only the post roads; but it seemed to him that the word "establish," comprehended something more. But suppose the Constitution to be silent, said Mr. C., why should we be confined in the application of money to the enumerated powers? There is nothing in the reason of the thing, that he could perceive, why it should be so restricted; and the habitual and uniform practice of the Government coincided with his opinion. Our laws are full of instances of money appropriated without any reference to the enumerated powers. We granted, by an unanimous vote, or nearly so, fifty thousand dollars to the distressed inhabitants of Caraccas, and a very large sum, at two different times, to the Saint Domingo refugees. If we are restricted in the use of our money to the enumerated powers, on what principle, said he, can the purchase of Louisiana be justified? To pass over many other instances, the identical power which is now the subject of discussion, has, in several instances, been exercised. To look no further back, at the last session a considerable sum was granted to complete the Cumberland road. In reply to this uniform course of legislation, Mr. C. expected it would be said, that our Constitution was founded on positive and written principles, and not on precedents. He did not deny the position; but he introduced these instances to prove the uniform sense of Congress, and the country, (for they had not been objected to,) as to our powers; and surely, said he, they furnish better evidence of the true interpretation of the Constitution than the most refined and subtle arguments.

Let it not be urged, that the construction for which he contended gave a dangerous extent to the powers of Congress. In this point of view, he conceived it to be more safe than the opposite. By giving a reasonable extent to the money power, it exempted us from the necessity of giving a strained and forced construction to the other enumerated powers. For instance, he said, if the public money could be applied to the purchase of Louisiana, as he contended, then there was no Constitutional difficulty in that purchase; but, if it could not, then were we compelled either to deny that we had the power to purchase, or to strain some of the enumerated powers to prove our right. It had, for instance, been said, that we had the right to purchase, under the power to admit new States—a construction, he would venture to say, far more forced than the one for which he contended. Such are my views, said he, on our right to pass this bill.

He believed that the passage of the bill would not be much endangered by a doubt of the power, as he conceived on that point there were not many who were opposed. The mode is principally objected to. A system, it is contended, ought to be presented before the money is appropriated. He thought differently. To set apart the fund appeared to him to be naturally the first act; at least he took it to be the only practicable course. A bill filled with details would have but a faint prospect of passing. The enemies to any possible system in detail and those who are opposed in principle, would unite and defeat it. Though he was unwilling to incorporate details in the bill, yet he was not adverse to presenting his views on that point. The first great object was to perfect the communication from Maine to Louisiana. This might be fairly considered as the principal artery of the whole system. The next was the connexion of the Lakes with the Hudson river. In a political, commercial, and military point of view, few objects could be more important. The next object of chief importance was to connect all the great commercial points on the Atlantic, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Charleston, and Savannah, with the Western States; and, finally, to perfect the intercourse between the West and New Orleans. These seemed to him to be the great objects. There were others, no doubt of great importance, which would receive the aid of Government. The fund proposed to be set apart in this bill was about six hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year, which was doubtless too small to effect such great objects of itself; but it would be a good beginning; and he had no doubt, when it was once begun, the great work will be finished. If the bill succeeds at the next session, the details can be arranged, and the system commenced. He could not consider those who objected merely to the mode to be very hearty in favor of the system. Every member must know that in all great measures it is necessary to concede something—as it is impossible to make all think alike in the minutiae of the measure who are agreed in principle. A deep conviction of the importance of the thing itself is almost sure to be accompanied with a liberal spirit of concession. The committee who introduced this bill gave it the shape in their opinion the most proper in itself and the most likely to succeed. If it cannot pass in its present form and under the present circumstances, it is certainly very doubtful whether it ever will. He felt a deep solicitude in relation to it. He was anxious that this Congress should have the reputation of it, and he was the more so, on account of the feelings which had been created against it. No body of men, in his opinion, ever better merited the confidence of the country than this Congress. For wisdom, firmness, and industry, it had never been excelled. To its acts he appealed for the truth of his assertions. The country already began to experience the benefit of its foresight and firmness. The diseased state of the currency, which many thought incurable, and most thought could not be healed in so short a time, begins to exhibit symptoms of speedy health. Uninfluenced by any other considerations than love of country and duty, said he, let us add this to the many useful measures already adopted. The money cannot be appropriated to a more exalted use. Every portion of the community, the farmer, mechanic, and merchant, will feel its good effects; and, what is of the greatest importance, the strength of the community will be augmented, and its political prosperity rendered more secure.

When Mr. CALHOUN had concluded his remarks, Mr. WRIGHT moved, for the purpose of destroying the bill, to strike out the first section.

Mr. PICKERING said he did not admit the latitude of construction given by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who introduced the bill, to the terms of the Constitution which he had quoted. Congress had power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises"—for what purpose? in order "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Hence, the gentleman inferred, that as public roads and canals would promote the general welfare, therefore Congress had power to make roads and canals. If this interpretation of the Constitution be correct, then the subsequent enumeration of powers to be exercised by Congress was superfluous; for the terms "to provide for the general welfare," would embrace the following enumerated powers, and every other imaginable power, the exercise of which would promote the "general welfare." The object for which the Constitution was ordained, is explicitly declared to be "to promote the general welfare;" and the like words at the head of the specified powers appeared to Mr. P. as intended to mark the line within which the powers expressed or fairly implied should be exercised: they must all have for their object the "general welfare." Then follows the enumeration of the powers granted to Congress: all of which are manifestly calculated "to promote the general welfare." From the specific powers granted to Congress "to establish post offices and post roads," the gentleman from South Carolina had inferred, that Congress had power to make roads, on which the post riders might travel. This construction Mr. P. believed to be altogether erroneous. He remembered that the supposition, that Congress might, under that clause, exercise the power of making roads, in any State, and where they pleased, was offered as a serious objection to the adoption of the Constitution in the Convention of Pennsylvania, of which Mr. P. (then living in that State) was a member. And his recollection was probably the more perfect, because he answered the objections, observing that the power "to establish post offices and post roads," could intend no more than the power to direct where post offices should be kept, and on what roads the mails should be carried; and this answer appeared then to be entirely satisfactory.

But while the gentleman from South Carolina was speaking, it had occurred to Mr. P., that if Congress had the power to make roads and canals, it must necessarily be an implied one, and under the express power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." To give facility and safety to foreign commerce, and to that between the several States, in what is called the coasting trade, Congress had caused light-houses and beacons to be erected, piers in rivers to be constructed, and the coast to be surveyed, to ascertain and mark dangerous shoals. But commerce (which consisted in the exchange of commodities) was carried on by land, as well as by water; and if Congress, under the clause for regulating commerce, could rightfully do, what, from the formation of the Government, they had been doing and without a single objection—erecting light-houses, beacons, and piers, to give facility and safety to commerce by water; why should they not exercise the like power to facilitate, secure and render less expensive, by means of roads and canals, the commerce by land? This, as it had occurred, Mr. P. suggested for consideration.

Mr. Root, of New York, moved an amendment to the section, (taking precedence of Mr. Wright's) by striking out the words "roads and," so as to confine the application of the fund exclusively to canals.

Mr. Root proceeded to support his motion; and said, if the national resources were to be directed to the internal improvement of the country, let them be applied to objects the least interfering with State policy, with State rights and sovereignty, and the best calculated to promote the general welfare and to aid in the regulation of commerce. These provisions in the Constitution he presumed would chiefly be relied on as giving power to Congress to act at all upon these subjects. It would hardly be pretended, he said, that the authority to establish post offices confers the power to lay out and work roads in despite of State regulations. The construction of roads is a municipal regulation, generally much more limited in its operation than the confines of a State. Except in some great leading roads, the convenience of counties and towns and even of neighborhoods, is, and ought to be, chiefly consulted. Roads, said Mr. R., even great leading ones, are used more by the inhabitants of their vicinity than by travellers from a distance. Not so with canals. They may connect distant States; unite in commercial connexions remote parts of the nation, and chain them together in bands not to be severed by ambition or faction. The distant boatman, the distant merchant make use of the canal, and by that means enhance the value of the farmer's produce, and reduce the price of merchandise necessary for his comfort. The inhabitants of its immediate vicinity derive no material advantages from it which are not shared in nearly an equal degree by their more remote neighbors, unless, as sometimes may happen, a village or town shall spring up in consequence. Canals are therefore, said he, more properly an object of national regard. Let your surplus treasure, Mr. Chairman, for it would seem that you have much of it, and I shall not urge the more rapid reduction of the public debt, nor the repeal of any of the taxes at this time; let your surplus treasure destined by this bill, not to be wasted, I hope, but to the achievement of great schemes of national grandeur, be directed exclusively to the construction of canals. Gentlemen, said Mr. R., may suppose that I have my eye directed to the contemplated great canal to connect the waters of the upper lakes with those of the Hudson river. I have, sir, I candidly confess, I have. If we are to go on in this way; if we are to expend the national resources on objects of this kind, said he, without waiting to examine our Constitutional powers, I wish to see a great national work accomplished; to see the waters of the Lakes connected with the Hudson and the Mississippi, Michigan with the Wisconsin and the Illinois, and Erie with the Wabash and Ohio. The intercourse between the Eastern and Western States might then form a ligature and a cement which no Hartford Convention could ever dissolve.

Mr. R. proceeded to show that a fund set apart for the construction of roads would not only operate very unequally upon different States, but might prove prejudicial to the roads themselves. From what he had heard stated, he said, he presumed that the first object was the great leading post road from Portland to Savannah, and perhaps he might say from Wiscasset, or even the bay of Passamaquoddy to St. Mary's. This road, he said, was already made from Wilmington in Delaware, to Portland in Maine, and he believed still further eastward. It is generally turnpiked, and by incorporated companies, who own the road, receive a toll, and are bound to keep it in repair. Will those corporations, he asked, permit you to apply any portion of your fund on their roads, under your direction, and without their consent? They might thank you for the money, but never permit you to lessen their tolls, nor to work upon the roads, unless corresponding with their wishes and under their direction. If you were to attempt to lay out a new road, or to assume to yourselves the present one, I imagine, said Mr. R., that you would find yourself unequal to the task of its execution. An assessment of damages to individuals or corporations, by authorities under your control, and an enforcement of your assumed powers, might meet with some little obstacle from State obstinacy, if you please, and eventually induce you to believe that you had nothing to do with the subject. Your money and your tolls, authority and all, would then sink into one common grave.

A good road from Baltimore, said Mr. R., to this Metropolis is nearly completed. The art of constructing turnpike roads, and he might say science, too, for it was reduced to a science, was travelling, like empire, from the East to the West, and to the Southwest. It would presently find its way, aided by "the wise men of the East," from this city even through Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia. The enterprise of individuals and corporations, of capitalists, under the fostering care of State Legislatures, already wise, but daily becoming more so, will eventually effect the object.

But suppose, said Mr. R., that you make a good road at the national expense through those States which have neglected to provide for themselves? A South Carolinian or Georgian may find a trip to Congress more easy and pleasant, but is it fair to tax the industrious and provident to make roads for the negligent? It would not be pretended, he presumed, that the United States were to erect gates and gather tolls on the roads of their construction. How unfair, then, would it be to give a free road to the negligent, and subject the people to the east and to the north of this city to the payment of tolls? It would be granting a bounty to negligence, which justice as well as policy forbids. The impolicy of the measure must be evident to every discerning mind.

An accumulating fund is created for certain definite objects, no part of which will probably be applied for several years. In the meantime all individual, corporate, and State exertion will be suspended, in the hope of sharing in the national bounty. The most negligent will hope to share the most, as their roads will be in the worst condition; and even in those States where the roads are at present in good order they may be suffered to go out of repair, in hopes by that means to come in for a share of the national fund. But a worse evil still is to grow out of this measure if adopted. Congress are hereafter to direct the application of the fund. What a scene of intrigue, scrambling, and bargaining may it not exhibit!—give me this, and I will give you that, may hereafter become the arguments addressed to honorable members. He wished to preserve the purity of legislation unsullied—uncontaminated by anything of the kind.

Mr. R. observed that he could not distinctly discern the policy of setting apart any particular fund for a particular object. When any proper object of national expenditure was presented to his mind he would vote for it, if the finances of the country would justify the disbursement, and he cared not from what source of revenue the money was derived. His only care would be to have it faithfully and economically applied. It was true, he observed, that certain portions of the revenues had been set apart and pledged to certain purposes; six hundred thousand dollars annually to be derived from the customs, were permanently appropriated to the civil list, but this probably grew out of that care which members of a former Congress, as well as of this, felt for themselves—charity began at home. A million and a quarter of the sales of land in the Mississippi Territory were pledged to Georgia, and five per cent. of the sales of land in Ohio and Indiana are to be applied to the making of roads in and to those States. These pledges, said he, grew out of contracts, the first to secure the payment of the consideration of the cession of that country by Georgia to the United States, and the latter in consideration that the United States land within those States should be exempt from taxation for a certain number of years. He believed, he said, that the Western lands were originally pledged to the redemption of the public debt, but he imagined that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund could hardly distinguish the money derived from a land office, from that derived from a custom-house or an office of excise.

He did not like pledges; they would either be broken in cases of emergency, or embarrass the fiscal operations of Government. Suppose, said Mr. R., that you had had, in the session of 1814 and 1815, an accumulated fund of ten millions, solemnly pledged to the construction of roads and canals, would you not have touched it? Would you not have seized upon it to save your sinking credit, and to feed and clothe your army? Yes, sir, you would have done it, and the occasion would have justified the measure. What would you say of an individual, Mr. Chairman; what should we all say, of a man—a planter, for instance—of large estate, who should pledge his crop of wheat to one object of expenditure, his tobacco to another, his corn to another, and his cotton to another, and by some device should attempt to put it out of his own power to change the direction? to endeavor to put it out of his own power to apply any portion of the avails of an abundant crop of one kind to supply the deficiency of another sort, which might happen to fail? We should, to say the best of him, declare his conduct very indiscreet. Mr. R. concluded by expressing a wish that we might have one great national purse, well replenished, and that Congress might, from time to time, order liberal, but not lavish disbursements for every object which may be well calculated to render this nation great, prosperous, and happy.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, next rose. He was opposed to the bill because it was vague, general, and unsatisfactory; because, in fact, it professed much and meant nothing. Where it was free from these objections there were others: it spoke of a pledge where there was no pledge; Congress had no power in this way to make one; it gave rise to no correspondent right vested in individuals or bodies corporate; no interest; could be repealed by any succeeding Legislature; and had no one feature of what it was called, a pledge. The bill, he said, was too general, and where it was specific, it was equally obnoxious to criticism. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) from the wide range of his magnificent views, had singled out, as alone deserving the attention of the General Government roads and canals. Education had been forgotten; education, on which depended the existence of this Republic; he could consider no subject of so much importance; none which so urgently required the aid and intervention of a wise Administration. The people here are the foundation, the essential constituents of the Government; on their wisdom depends its wisdom; on their devotion to freedom depends its safety. I would strengthen the foundation before I ornamented the edifice. There is nothing wonderful in this scheme about roads and canals; it does not surprise by its novelty, or enrapture by its utility; other Governments have effected these things on plans even more magnificent than we propose. England and France have set us the example. As far as the prosperity of nations depends on works of this description, there is scarcely a despotism that may not set up high claims; have they ever endeavored to enlighten the people? No. Have we? No; because we are humble imitators. Did the happiness of a people ever enter into the scheme of Administration? No, never; but they have been sufficiently kind to point out the means and facilitate the efforts of increasing wealth; and for what? That they might afterwards slich it from them by taxes, or take it from them by robbery, to expend in wars, on roads, canals, palaces, and other splendid displays, which highminded Governments are always proud to boast. I say again, let us educate and instruct the people. Nature makes man; education makes social man; it is a second creation. On the good sense and virtue of a people depend republicanism. Their wealth may be increased by roads and canals; but this wealth, if they are slaves, is not distributed among the mass, but divided between the Government and the favored few. Let a people alone and they will be sufficiently rich. Why are they poor? Because they are not permitted to labor and to enjoy the fruits of their labor in their own way; others officiously must intermeddle. Their governors know much better than they how to manage their affairs, and all this ends in the misery and ignorance and slavery of the many, and the corruption, bloated insolence, and unbridled power of the few. The Constitution of the United States is an anomaly; the friends of England affect to assimilate it to the British form of Government. It certainly a little more resembles that Government than the Government of Turkey; but it is totally different. My mind can imagine no two things more opposite than an elective and an hereditary Government; they are indeed antipodes. If our Constitution then is novel and singular, so let our Administration be. Let us not servilely copy from Europe the course of policy which we ought to pursue; and especially as all other nations have been ruined by regulation let us not split on that rock. Let us make the experiment of leaving a people to themselves, and as we do not now allow individuals to interfere with each other in the exercise of their rights, so let us as a Government lay the same restraint upon ourselves; rely upon it things will go on as well. There is at least as much wisdom out of all Governments as in them.

Mr. R. said, that he had objected to this bill because it was too general; he wished to understand it more specifically; he wished the gentleman from South Carolina to descend a little into detail. His own mind was one of that sort described by the gentleman, which could not with ease embrace or would not admit grand and magnificent views without something like explanation and examination. He was unreasonable enough to wish to know some such facts as these: where and when and by whom were these roads and canals to be made; who was to have the care and management of them? Was the General Government to interfere in this sort of mere police? He thought it belonged more properly to individuals or to the States.

He did not wish to be understood as being adverse to internal improvements; far from it. I hope, said Mr. R., I am not so dull as not to appreciate their value, or to approve the views generally of the gentleman from South Carolina. I differ with him in regard to their relative importance; I prefer improving the minds of the citizens of the country; the gentleman would rather improve the country itself. Although, too, I admire the brilliant picture which the gentleman has presented to us in his discourse, it does not follow that I should support his bill, which seems to me not very intimately connected with it or calculated to effect any purpose whatever. Good roads and canals are of undisputed importance. I agree in all the advantages which have been attributed to them; there is indeed but one opinion in this regard. Are there no other public works of equal consequence? What will be objected to establishing schools, clearing out and embanking rivers, deepening harbors, draining marshes; why appropriate exclusively for the objects embraced by this bill? The question now is, by what power are these and other improvements of a similar kind to be effected? Gentlemen contend that they belong to the General Government. I am inclined to the opinion that they had better be left to the regulation of the States. They are in their nature internal; they are minute and involved in detail; they require a close and ready supervision; they are of the nature of police; they require, in fact, the agency of officers and laws which are to be found only in the institutions of the individual States. The General Government, from its nature, from the force of the term, should engage in business of a general description; should provide for the general welfare; should make peace and war. I will not recapitulate the broadly extended powers which it possesses, and to which it should confine itself. A clear line of demarcation ought to be drawn between the United States and State governments. Interference ought to be avoided. Let the one attend to internal improvement, the other to the great concern of this nation in regard to foreign nations—in relation to the sovereign States which form this Confederacy, and their clear general powers of an external character, and their acknowledged specified powers of an internal nature.

Internal Improvement.

Before we pass, then, finally on this proposition, it is necessary to be assured that it involves no violation of the Constitution. I cannot agree in the loose manner of construing that instrument, which has been recommended and adopted by my friend from South Carolina. He will not consider it as a thesis to be too strictly examined. I care not what it is called; it is the charter of the rights of this Government; it is its grant of power. I will not approach it irreverently, or pass by it slightly. Without, however, expressing any opinion on its bearing on the present question, I prefer a plan which it is my purpose to propose by way of amendment, that will at least obviate this difficulty. If the United States have money to spare, let it be distributed among the States to be applied to works of internal improvement. The States are better judges of their wants and interests; they know best whether they most require roads or canals, or schools, or dykes, or embankments. They can more conveniently, too, give that attention which objects of this nature demand. They can more successfully provide against profuse and wasteful expenditure. This plan, too, possesses other advantages. It will prevent the disgraceful scene which will be exhibited in this House, when we shall be called upon to designate the position and course of the contemplated roads and canals, when all our local feelings will be up in arms, and, under a pretence of general benefit, we shall have in view exclusively the interests of the State or district which we represent. There are already, necessarily, causes enough of this unpleasant and dangerous hostility. We had better diminish than add to their number. But, above all, it is free from Constitutional objection, and leaves with the independent and sovereign members of this Confederation the care of internal improvements, peculiarly their province, unless indeed we are to have in practice what is anxiously wished by many—one grand, magnificent, consolidated empire.

Mr. R. could not readily realize the magnitude of the present plan—a road from Maine to Louisiana. England, about as large as one of our eighteen States, with a dense population, had some hundred miles of turnpike road. France, with comparatively narrow limits, and 25,000,000 of inhabitants, had also hers; and we, with a sparse population, scattered over a boundless extent of country, were all at once far to outstrip either, with our artificial road of 3,000 miles; because, too, they had no rivers, and found canals of great utility, we, with the fine and innumerable rivers, furnishing convenient and natural navigation, were also to have our canals.

Mr. R. would repeat again his objection to too much intermeddling on the part of the General Government; he could trace all the evils of nations to this spirit. He believed they were unhappy and wretched in proportion to the degree of management on the part of Government. To what did we owe our prosperity? He would tell gentlemen to what we did not owe it: We did not owe it to legislation; we owed it to circumstances independent of laws; we owed it to our Constitution, to our soil and climate, to our increasing population, to our exemption from the paternal care of Government.

Mr. R. believed that internal improvements had better be left to the States; that the subjects would be better selected by them and better attended to. He concluded his remarks by offering an amendment, directing that the fund should be distributed among the several States according to their representation, to be applied by them to such objects of improvement as they might think proper.

The amendment not however being in order pending Mr. Root's motion, was suspended for the present.

Mr. Root's motion to limit the application of the funds to canals alone having been negatived, the question recurred on Mr. ROBERTSON'S motion to amend the bill, so as to apportion the fund among the several States, according to their representation in Congress, to be by them applied to such objects of improvement as they might think proper.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) observed, that it was not his intention to enter into the general discussion of the subject; he wished only to say that he had long thought that there were no two subjects which would engage the attention of the National Legislature more worthy of its deliberate consideration, than those of internal improvements and domestic manufactures. He rose, however, principally to express his thanks to the honorable member from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) for bringing this bill before Congress, and for the able and luminous view which he had submitted to the Committee, of the importance and utility of internal improvements, and to oppose the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana. He conceived the first and only step necessary to be taken at the present session, was to set apart and make an inviolable pledge of the fund. If we attempt anything beyond this; if we touch the details; if we go into a specification of the objects on which the fund is to be expended, the inevitable effect will be, that we shall do nothing. Whether it was better to establish a board for the appropriation of the fund, or to distribute it among the several States, and what were the national objects which demand its application, were posterior questions, which ought to be discussed and decided hereafter.

Mr. C. said that, as to the Constitutional point which had been made, he had not a doubt on his mind; but it was not necessary, in his judgment, to embarrass the passage of the bill with the argument of that point at this time. It was a sufficient answer, to say that the power was not now to be exercised. It was proposed merely to designate the fund, and, from time to time, as the proceeds of it came in, to invest them in the funded debt of the United States. It would thus be accumulating; and Congress could, at some future day, examine into the constitutionality of the question; and, if it has the power, it would exercise it; if it has not, the Constitution, there could be very little doubt, would be so amended as to confer it. It was quite obvious, however, that Congress might so direct the application of the fund, as not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the several States, and thus avoid the difficulty which had been started. It might distribute it among those objects of private enterprise which called for national patronage, in the form of subscriptions to the capital stock of incorporated companies, such as that of the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, and other similar institutions. Perhaps that might be the best way to employ the fund; but he repeated, that this was not the time to go into that inquiry.

With regard to the general importance of the proposition—the effect of internal improvements in cementing the Union—in facilitating internal trade—in augmenting the wealth and the population of the country, he would not consume the time of the Committee in discussing those interesting topics, after the able manner in which they had been treated by his friend from South Carolina. In reply to those who thought that internal improvements had better be left to the several States, he would ask, he would put it to the candor of every one, if there were not various objects in which many States were interested, and which, requiring therefore their joint co-operation, would, if not taken up by the General Government, be neglected, either for the want of resources, or from the difficulty of regulating their respective contributions? Such was the case with the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio at the rapids; the canal, from the Hudson to the Lakes; the great turnpike road, parallel with the coast, from Maine to Louisiana. These, and similar objects, were stamped with a national character; and they required the wisdom and the resources of the nation to accomplish them. No particular State felt an individual interest sufficient to execute improvements of such magnitude. They must be patronized, efficaciously patronized, by the General Government, or they never would be accomplished.

The practical effect of turnpike roads in correcting the evil, if it be one, of the great expansion of our Republic, and in conquering space itself, as was expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, is about to be demonstrated by the great turnpike road from Cumberland to Wheeling. That road is partially executed, and will probably be completed in about three years. In the meantime, Maryland is extending a line of turnpike roads from Baltimore to Cumberland, which is also partially finished, and will be completed in the same period. Three years from the present time, we shall have a continued line of turnpike roads from Baltimore to Ohio. The ordinary time requisite to travel from Wheeling to Baltimore, prior to the erection of these roads, was eight days. When the roads are completed, the same journey may be performed in three days. The distance, in effect, between those two points, will be diminished in the proportion of five-eighths, or, in other words, they will be brought five days nearer to each other. Similar results will follow wherever this species of improvement is effected. My friend from Louisiana says, his State wants no roads. Does she want no levees? But Mr. C. conceived that no State was more interested in the making of good roads. The most vulnerable to a foreign enemy of all the points of our country, Louisiana is, at the same time, the most dependent upon the other parts of the Union for the means of her defence. Is she not, therefore, deeply interested in multiplying the channels by which those means may be transported to her? If two great roads, the one following the valley of the Ohio, and that of the Mississippi; and the other, the maritime coast, shall terminate at New Orleans, will not the security of Louisiana be greatly increased?

Mr. C. owned that he felt anxiously desirous for the success of this measure. He was anxious, from its intrinsic merits, from his sincere conviction of its tendency greatly to promote the welfare of our common country. He was anxious, from other, perhaps more selfish, considerations. He wished the Fourteenth Congress to have the merit of laying the foundations of this great work. He wished this Congress, who, in his opinion, had so many other just grounds for the national approbation, notwithstanding the obloquy which had attended a single unfortunate measure, to add this new claim to the public gratitude. He even anticipated pleasure from the reflection, distant as it might be, that the traveller, as he comfortably prosecutes his journey on some road, or glides down on some canal, erected in virtue of this bill, will say, I owe this facility, this convenience, to the providence and sagacity of the Fourteenth Congress. But, Mr. C. said, he must repress his feelings on this subject. He had risen to oppose the amendment. Let us leave details to our successors. We cannot accomplish everything at once. Like the objects of the bill, our measures must be necessarily progressive. Everything is hazarded by encumbering the bill with too much detail. Indeed, he doubted whether we had a sufficient stock of local information yet collected, to guide our judgments in designating the various objects of internal improvement which may require the fostering care of the General Government. Let us provide the ways and means. Let our successors judiciously apply them. He would vote against the amendment.

Mr. TELFAIR moved to amend Mr. ROBERTSON'S amendment, by vesting in Congress the power of designating the objects of improvement, to be executed by the States, and offered a few remarks in support of his motion. He would retain in the hands of the General Government, all objects of a general nature—such, for instance, as the road from Maine to Georgia, which the States individually could not carry into effect. Such great and general objects he thought ought to be directed, and the appropriations made by the General Government, but their execution should be left to the States, who would be better able for many reasons to carry the objects into effect. He approved the amendment because it deprived the General Government of a mass of patronage in the appointment of a great many persons to superintend the various works. Besides, suppose, said Mr. T. you pass a law directing a road to be run in a certain direction, can you undertake to cut up a man's land which might be in the way? This privilege was constantly exercised by the States, and could be done by them, but it was very questionable whether it could be by the General Government. The amendment would relieve the bill from this objection, as well as make it more acceptable in other respects.

Mr. YATES, of New York, observed that he did not rise with any intention to discuss the general merits of the bill, or the policy of the measure. The objections urged by the Speaker and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN) who introduced this bill, to the amendments offered, were not in his opinion well founded—on the contrary, he had very little doubt, that, if adopted, they would rather aid the passage of the law, than retard it. Possibly he might have voted in favor of the law as it was reported, but was rather inclined against it; and was gratified when he heard the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana, and still more so with the additional one subsequently offered by the member from Georgia—the only objectionable features in the bill were in his view removed by them. It had been made a question, whether we have a Constitutional right to make this disposition of public money; he regarded this right as evidently vested in Congress; at least such was his conviction, and, whether the power be classed under the right to provide for the national defence and general welfare, and to levy taxes and impose duties for that purpose, the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, or to establish post offices and post roads, is not material; if all or either give the power, it is sufficient. If under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, the right to construct piers and erect light-houses be given by necessary implication as acknowledged, why does it not as necessarily follow, that, under the right to regulate commerce among the several States, the power to make appropriations for the construction of canals and roads, to facilitate the intercourse between the States, is also given; he had no doubt on that subject. The individual States had the power of municipal regulations, but all commercial arrangements between the States, fell within the powers of the General Government, and if it become necessary, in the exercise of those powers, to expend money for the removing of obstacles to an easy intercourse, he could find nothing to prohibit it.

With regard to the amendments, he thought them necessary; because, by the bill, the amount to be given to each State was uncertain; it was indefinite, and would induce exertions on the part of each to obtain more than its proportion. This might possibly, instead of producing a beneficial result, have an injurious tendency. The amendment proposes a distribution proportioned to the representation. This is the only just and definite mode. The other amendment will be a check on the abuse of this privilege. Congress, retaining the power of designating, will always prevent the expenditure of the money for purposes which are not of sufficient national importance. The States will not have it in their power to expend the money on objects of inferior consideration—for his part he intended to vote for both the amendments, and if they were adopted, was persuaded they would conciliate many who were hostile to the bill.

The question was taken on Mr. TELFAIR'S motion, and carried; and then on Mr. ROBERTSON'S amendment as modified, and also carried.

Mr. WRIGHT'S motion to strike out the first section, was decided in the negative—ayes 61, noes 70. The Committee then rose and reported the bill to the House; and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 5.

Mr. STEARNS presented a petition of the Society for propagating the Gospel among the Indians in North America, praying the General Government to adopt some measures for establishing and supporting schools for instructing Indian children and youth in the arts of reading and writing; which was ordered to a select committee; and Mr. STEARNS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. LYON, and Mr. WOODWARD, were appointed the committee.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from a further consideration of the petition of sundry inhabitants of Pennsylvania, relative to patents, and that the said petition lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed, by a resolution of the 8th ultimo, to inquire into the expediency of allowing to certain non-commissioned officers and soldiers in the late war, who served to the end thereof, but did not obtain their regular discharge, or who died, or were killed, their balance of pay and the bounty in lands, made a report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit:

An act in addition to an act, for the relief of George T. Ross and Daniel T. Patterson, and the officers and men lately under their command.

An act to repeal the second section of an act, concerning the pay of the officers, seamen, and marines in the Navy of the United States.

An act making appropriations for the payment of certain claims for militia services to the State of Georgia.

An act to appoint additional pension agents.

An act to amend and explain an act, given pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States.

An act for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased; and,

An act granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor, in which several bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled, "an act making an appropriation, to enable the President of the United States to hold treaties with the Indian tribes for the purpose therein mentioned;" reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to set apart and pledge the bonus and United States dividends of the National Bank, as a fund for internal improvements.

Mr. PICKERING rose to offer an amendment to the amendments made by the Committee; when

Mr. KING intimated that he also wished to propose some amendments to the bill, and moved that it be laid for the present on the table.

The motion prevailed, and the bill was laid on the table accordingly.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, went into Committee of the Whole, on sundry bills connected with the Military Establishment.

The first taken up by the Committee, was a bill concerning the invalids of the Revolutionary War, and of the widows and children of the militia, and of the soldiers of the Army during the late war. [Placing pensioners of the Revolutionary War and of the Indian war, previous to the Treaty of Greenville, on the same footing—and for allowing five years' half pay to the widows or orphans of any officer or soldier of the militia, rangers, sea fencibles, and twelve and fifteen months volunteers, who shall have died within three months after returning home, of any disease contracted while in the military service, &c.]

The Committee were occupied more than two hours in discussing various propositions to amend this bill, some of which were adopted; and having gone through the bill,

The Committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill making further provision for military services during the late war.

This bill having been also gone through and variously amended,

The Committee, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, took up the bill for the establishment of a National Armory, [adjacent to the river Ohio or its branches, and appropriating $60,000 for the object.]

Mr. CANNON moved to add after "Ohio" the river Tennessee, and suggested several points on the waters of the Tennessee, well adapted to the erection of water-works for the establishment.

Mr. JACKSON opposed the amendment as unnecessary, because the Tennessee being a branch of the Ohio, of course would be taken into consideration by the President in fixing the site, as well as the Monongahela, the Muskingum, the Cumberland, &c.

The motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. PICKENS moved to insert after the word Ohio, the river Catawba, as affording good sites, abundance of iron, and every advantage for the establishment of a manufactory of arms.

After a few remarks by Mr. JOHNSON, adverse to the amendment, the motion was negatived; and the bill being read through without amendment,

The Committee took up the bill to repeal so much of the act of July, 1812, as authorizes additional pay and emoluments to brevet officers, and to allow additional rations to commanding officers of separate posts only in cases in which the officer shall be of or under the rank of colonel.

Mr. HARRISON warmly opposed the bill, and, to destroy it, moved that the first section be stricken out.

Mr. LOWNDES supported the expediency of the provision contemplated by the bill, as necessary to remove any ambiguity heretofore existing in construing the laws on the subject, and to ascertain the emoluments; not to reduce improperly those justly due.

Mr. CLAY likewise supported the bill, because, as there were officers enough to perform the military duties referred to, it was unnecessary to assign those duties to brevet officers—that he saw with pleasure the report of the bill by the Committee of Ways and Means, as it would effect a salutary reduction of the expenses of the Government in the Military Department, and though fully impressed with the services and merits of the officers of the Army, yet he hoped to see every practicable reduction, every proper retrenchment of the heavy expenses now incurred annually for the Military Establishment.

Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, likewise advocated the bill—believing that brevet rank was intended only as an honorary reward for gallant services, and that it was not contemplated by the existing statutes to connect with or extend it to additional pecuniary rewards.

Mr. HARRISON again opposed the bill, contending that the pay now received had been well earned by the gallant services rendered by our officers, and entered into some comparison to show that our officers, the higher ones particularly, were even worse paid and fewer in proportion, to the number of men, than those of any other civilized country.

Mr. CLAY spoke warmly in reply; maintaining that the country had in every way evinced its gratitude to the heroes of the Army and Navy for their great services, and that it was not proper to open the coffers of the Treasury to heap further pecuniary rewards on those who had already received so large though merited a share of public rewards.

Much further discussion followed; after which the motion to strike out the first section was negatived; and the Committee rose, reported its proceedings to the House, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 6.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Naval Expenditures, reported a bill, supplementary to an act entitled "An act concerning the Naval Establishment;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill, to define and enlarge the boundaries of the land district of Edwardsville, in the Illinois Territory; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri.

Mr. R. also reported a bill, to authorize the sale of the northeast quarter of section No. 16, in township No. 4 North, range No. 1, West of the third principal meridian; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

After some introductory remarks, on the utility of the object he desired to have inquired into, Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appointing commissioners to view and mark out a road, from the highest point of navigation on the James river to that of the Great Kanawha, and from thence to Point Pleasant, on the Ohio, in Virginia.

The following bills from the Senate, to wit: The bill providing for the division of certain quarter-sections in future sales of the public lands; the bill, in addition to the act, for the relief of George T. Ross and Daniel T. Patterson, and the officers and men lately under their command; the bill to repeal the second section of the act concerning the pay of officers, seamen, and marines, in the Navy of the United States; the bill making appropriations for the payment of certain claims for militia services to the State of Georgia; the bill to appoint additional pension agents; the bill to amend and explain an act, giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States; the bill for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold H. Dohrman; and the bill granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor; were severally read the first and second time, and referred.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Lewis Olmstead from imprisonment;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill authorizing the appointment of circuit judges, and for other purposes, and the bill was committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House then took up the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, to the bill to set apart and pledge, as a fund for internal improvement, the bonus and United States share of the dividends of the National Bank.

Mr. PICKERING stated some modifications of the amendments which he wished to propose, but, not now being in order, he reserved them for the present.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, proposed to define more precisely the mode of apportioning the fund among the different States, by inserting the words, "according to the House of Representatives in Congress."

Mr. PICKERING objected to the motion, as well as to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as leaving the objects of improvement still too vague and indefinite.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed it, because the present representation might be reduced, but could not be increased, and that a State would now receive a modicum of the fund which might hereafter become almost nothing; and therefore he wished it should be apportioned according to the present representation, not be subject to the great changes which should hereafter take place in the relative representation of the States in Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR supported his motion; after which the motion was agreed to, and the question recurred on the amendment as amended: when

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved so to amend the amendment, as to apportion the fund which shall accrue according to the present representation in Congress, which he supported on the ground that many States, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Maryland, &c., would never have an increase of members, whilst others would greatly increase; and if we are to be taxed, (and he viewed this as a tax for internal improvements,) he wished the States to enjoy the benefits according to the tax they are about to pay, as it was to be frittered away among the several States, to be wasted on little objects, instead of being applied to some great national object, &c.

The motion was opposed by Mr. CALHOUN, because the incorporation of such a principle would destroy the bill; the great principle of the Government being a community of interest, and established for the general benefit, the amendment would be highly improper, as well as prejudicial, to the great object in view.

Mr. HARDIN also opposed the motion, and argued against distributing the fund at all among the States; which, in time, when the representation of some of the new States should be doubled, would embarrass, if not entirely defeat the execution of the object.

The motion was also opposed briefly by Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. KILBOURN, and at some length by Mr. SHARP; the latter gentleman arguing that the fund was not a temporary but a permanent one, and formed a part of the common property of the nation; that it was the same as the proceeds of the direct tax, or sales of the public lands, which, though drawn from the western country, was still common revenue, and could no more be appropriated by the rule proposed, than could the fund now under consideration, &c.; that the proposition was in fact one of inequality and injustice, as it looked to a change of wealth and population, and yet was to be distributed with an entire disregard of that change.

Mr. SMITH replied, that this fund would be drawn from the people before the next census is taken; and of course, being contributed by the nation according to the present state of wealth and population, ought to be apportioned according to the rule by which it is derived, and not be subjected to changes, which, without affecting the contribution, would reduce the benefits to be derived by the States from this fund they now pay.

After much more discussion, in which Messrs. HULBERT, GOLD, and YATES, took part—

Mr. SMITH's motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. STEARNS moved, that, instead of vesting in Congress the power of designating the objects of improvement, it should be given to the State Legislatures, under the approbation of the President.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. SHEFFEY, PICKERING, and GROSVENOR; when it was negatived without a division, and the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, and carried—ayes 84.

Mr. PICKERING then moved to strike out all the first section of the bill, after the enacting clause, and to insert the following, as the first and second sections thereof:

That the bonus secured to the United States by the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, and the dividends which shall arise from their shares in its capital stock, during the present term of twenty years, for which the proprietors thereof have been incorporated, be, and the same are hereby, set apart and pledged as a fund for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for their common defence.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the moneys constituting the said fund shall from time to time be applied in constructing, or to aid in constructing such roads or canals, or improving the navigation of such water-courses, or both, in each State, as Congress, with the assent of such State, shall by law direct, and in the manner most conducive to the general welfare; and the proportion of the said moneys to be expended on the objects aforesaid, in each State, shall be in the ratio of its representation, at the time of its expenditure, in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature.

Mr. INGHAM, in remarking on the objection to the words internal improvement, as too indefinite, and the proposition to confine the application of the fund to making roads and canals expressly, suggested, what he thought a middle ground, as he believed it would be found sometimes, and in some places, more advantageous to improve the beds of rivers than either of the above objects, and moved to include that object in the designation to be given in the amendment proposed by Mr. PICKERING.

Mr. ROBERTSON was adverse to this proposition, as it would confine the application of the fund to certain objects, when there were yet other objects of internal improvement equally deserving the attention and aid of the Government, and equally important; which opinion he argued to establish.

Mr. PICKERING supported his motion, and argued at length against giving the expenditure of the fund to the several States, as the general welfare was the peculiar province of the General Government, and was the very pole star of its objects and intentions; and, touching on the Constitutional objections, thought it very probable that, under the general power to regulate and facilitate commerce, that Congress had the power to apply this fund to the making of roads and canals, &c.

Mr. PITKIN disputed the power of Congress to apply the public funds to such objects, or even to incorporate a company to make a canal; that if this principle were adopted, Congress might assume any power, and argued to establish this opinion, and the belief that the power of Congress extended only to the objects expressly given in the Constitution, &c. As to the expediency of the scheme, he would prefer aiding companies, or individual enterprise, instead of taking these objects entirely in the hands of the Government, &c.

Mr. PICKERING, after briefly replying to Mr. PITKIN, modified his amendment, so as to embrace the motion of Mr. INGHAM, to add "the improvement of any water-course."

Mr. CALHOUN, though extremely anxious to accommodate the bill to the views of others, so as to receive as much support as possible, yet felt himself obliged to object to the modification just made, and moved to restore Mr. PICKERING's motion to the shape in which he first moved it. Mr. C. moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "with the assent of such State."

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved to postpone the bill indefinitely. From the great number of amendments already proposed, said he, and from the extreme difficulty of agreeing upon its provisions, or even the principles thereof, I think it my duty to move the indefinite postponement of the subject. This I do as well to save time as because I am opposed to the measure as inexpedient and unnecessary. I must call off the attention and bring down the imaginations of honorable gentlemen from the great and splendid objects of internal improvement, which they have been contemplating, to the present situation of our country and of the American people. Look at your statute books—see there the many taxes, direct and indirect, now paid by the citizens of this country—and ask yourselves whether it be proper to make the appropriation proposed by this bill, and yet continue these burdens. You are the Representatives of the people. Ask yourselves, further, whether the people whom you represent, were they acting on this subject, would make this extravagant application of their own funds. Your internal taxes ought first to be repealed, and the present high duties on imports greatly reduced. Besides the burdens imposed upon them by the Government, the people of this country are at this moment suffering under the frowns of Divine Providence in relation to the season of the last year, whereby they were deprived of their usual provision for man and beast. And what is the conduct of the Governor General of a neighboring province at this time of calamity and distress? I allude to the Governor General of Canada, in his last communication to the Provincial Parliament. His whole attention appears engrossed by the distressed situation of the people under his command, and by the means to relieve them. This conduct forcibly recalls to my recollection the words of one of his own distinguished writers: "Industry (says he) is the source of our country's wishes, and English policy would teach opulence to dry the peasant's tear, if English justice and generosity did not continually prevent its flowing." But I need not appeal to the examples of other Governments for acts of justice and generosity, but to the hearts and understanding of an American Congress. What I mention of the burdens and distress of the people is by no means imaginary—would to God it were—by no means exaggerated. I hold in my hand, sir, certified lists of the taxes paid in the town wherein I reside, (in Maine,) and in two other towns near thereto, to the State, county, and town there, and to the United States. To the former, the town first mentioned, in an average of five years, pays $6,980 a year; to the latter, for 1814, including the direct tax, $2,246; and for 1815, $1,223. The whole population at the last enumeration 2,492, taxable polls 520—being between three and four dollars for every man, woman, and child, or between seventeen and eighteen dollars for each taxable inhabitant, if applied to the polls—obliging men in the middle classes of life to pay, some forty, some eighty, and others one hundred dollars, per annum. The results in the other towns nearly the same. Portland, which has suffered severely by the depression of commerce and navigation, with a population of 7,100, paid on an average of five years ending with 1816 by State, county, and town taxes, $15,125; and to the United States, in an average of two years, (1814 and 1815,) $12,219 for internal taxes. Some of the letters to me conveying the above information contain most distressing accounts of the situation of many of the inhabitants. [Mr. K. here read extracts from several letters from his correspondents. One of them says: "I think our condition here wants much more improvement than internal roads and canals; for I know not how the people will possibly obtain bread this season. Indian corn is sold here at fifteen and sixteen shillings per bushel, and scarce at that. It is said that a poor man here lately worked five days for cash enough to get one bushel of corn! His family is a wife and five or six children."] I only cite these instances as falling within my own observation, but the distress is general and great. How are a people thus circumstanced to pay the heavy dues to Government? Yet we see no bill introduced to repeal the internal taxes. Indeed, sir, if you lavish the public treasures as proposed by this and other bills, it is impossible that any of those laws should ever be repealed. We have lately heard on this floor something in favor of economy, retrenchment; but to what purpose retrench, if you are thus prodigal of the people's money? Besides, you have yet many claims upon your justice, and upon your humanity, to satisfy the numerous demands arising from the desolations of war, to stop the bleeding wounds of the soldier, and bind up the broken-hearted widow, and succor the fatherless orphan of your war. Nay, more, your military are insatiable in their demands—I mean such of them as prefer money to honor, and such there are, who would not hesitate to open your Treasury with the bayonet!

Mr. GOLD, of New York, observed, that the Constitution was interposed as an obstacle to the appropriation. When, he said, shall we have any principle settled and at rest in this Government? Is everything to be kept in fluctuation and uncertainty in all future time, and the fruits of experience, the benefit of example, of precedent, which is admitted in everything else, to find no place here?

It is now twenty-five years since this great Constitutional question was argued before the people of the United States. It was argued by the greatest of men, and decided under the most favorable auspices. It was decided shortly after the adoption of the Constitution, while the objects of the instrument and the views of its authors were well understood; and WASHINGTON yielded to the decision his deliberate sanction.

Most important measures of the Government have been adopted in conformity with this decision. It is time, I must think, to apply the principle of "res judicata," and put the question at rest. It may be truly said, that there has been as general an acquiescence of the community in the decision as could be expected in a case on which the great parties of the country divided in violent hostility. I may add, further, the case was rightly decided.

The express power delegated by the Constitution over commerce, applies equally, and in the same terms, to internal, to "commerce among the States," as to foreign commerce; and the authority of Congress is as plenary, as absolute, over one as the other: it is all the power which any sovereign integral government could or ought to exercise upon broad principles of legislation. This power is most essential. In war a superior naval force may lock up the coasting trade of the country; the effects of which can be obviated only by a chain of canals from bay to bay, along the line of the seaboard. Improved roads may contribute to the same purpose. Interior facilities of communication may be added to enliven industry, and mitigate the pressure of war.

From another specified power, to provide for the "common defence," this Constitutional question derives great support. The rapid movement of troops from one point of attack to another, as well on the seaboard as the inland frontier, to meet the varying attacks of an enemy; the speedy transport of ordnance and heavy naval equipments, to points of assault and defence, will often become indispensable. The experience of the last war places the subject in the strongest light. The dangerous delays in the transportation of ordnance and naval equipments, will be remembered by all. Weeks, nay, I may say months, elapsed in the forwarding of ordnance, anchors, &c., from the seaboard to the northern frontier of New York. I am not certain that the anchor of the last great ship, built at Sackett's Harbor, has yet reached that place. A military road, as well as a canal, is highly necessary between the Hudson and the Lakes; and this for the defence of the country.

On general principles, as applicable to the territory of the United States; a territory extending from the frozen region of the north to the climate of the sugar cane and the vine; from the Atlantic to the setting sun in the west, it is impossible not to see the fairest theatre for internal commerce, that was ever presented to any government, ancient or modern. To overlook these advantages—to stay the hand of improvement, is to do the greatest injustice to the community; is to be wanting in the highest duty of legislation. What, sir, have we recently seen? The British Government, relying on supplies to be drawn from the northern parts of the United States, through the provinces of the Canadas and New Brunswick, united with the scanty products of those provinces, for her West India islands, has interdicted all trade, in American ships, between our Atlantic ports and those islands. If those supplies from the States to Montreal, are not prevented by canal improvements between the great Lakes and the Hudson, affording facilities to a market in the States, the present policy of Great Britain will prove successful, and a deep and lasting wound be inflicted on our commerce, and the nursery of our seamen.

It was about the close of the last war that a volume was published by a Mr. Anderson, addressed to the British Government, on behalf of the provinces of the Canadas and New Brunswick. The great object was, to show that those provinces, aided by supplies to be drawn from the adjoining States of the Union, could satisfy the wants of the British West Indies.

The writer urges at great length the benefits of the intercourse between those provinces and the States; the supplies to be drawn from the latter; and, more than all, the means of smuggling British manufactures into the States all along a line of eleven hundred miles from the northeast to the northwest point of our territory. He insists that this illicit trade may bid defiance to the inspection laws of the United States. The experiment is now in course of trial by the British Government, whether she may not wholly exclude our shipping from her West India islands. Our own citizens are, in their export to Canada, daily giving strength to this policy, and it is impossible for the Government of this country to shut their eyes against the consequences. Commercial connexions are forming, and the trade has already swelled to an amount beyond what will be easily credited.

It is not to be dissembled, that the State of New York has a great object in opening the commercial intercourse between the Lakes and the Hudson river, in order to turn the trade from Montreal to New York. Has not this State, let me ask, a claim on the National Government to aid her in commercial improvements? New York, in the national compact, relinquished to the Union the richest harvest of impost ever gathered into the Treasury; an impost which she might have retained to herself, and with which she might have carried improvements in canals and roads, to every commanding point of her extended territory. The port of New York yields to the Government nearly one-third of the commercial revenue of the Union, and the product of the last year only would transcend the entire cost of the great canal from Lake Erie to the Hudson. The equity of this claim is confidently addressed to the Government; it is hoped the appeal will not be made in vain.

It has been, Mr. Speaker, the singular lot of great national enterprises, and especially of canals, to be resisted by prejudice, by narrow calculations and short-sighted views, but in the end success has been signal and the triumph complete. While the effects have swelled the tide of national prosperity, the authors have received a rich reward for their toils and perseverance. The honorable member from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who so zealously brought the subject, now under consideration, before Congress, and has so ably vindicated it, well merits, in my humble opinion, the thanks of his country. It is the commencement of a system of improvement which cannot fail to confer the greatest and most lasting benefits on the community. The subject of the patriot's fears, the vulnerable point of the body politic, is the imperfect union of the States. Now, sir, what can better promote and secure this great object of national solicitude than the measure under consideration? It is, sir, by improved roads and canals that commercial intercourse, in this widely extended empire, is promoted, and the citizens of remote parts brought into correspondence and acquaintance with each other; it is by such means alone that the North and the South, the East and the West, can be cemented and preserved in a lasting bond of union.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he had ever been in favor of internal improvements, and he had carried theory into practice as far as his humble abilities and private means enabled him to do. There were few public improvements, he said, in the district he represented, that had not had his aid. As a member of Congress, he had given his vote and his aid to every improvement of the country that had in view a national object. But, sir, said Mr. S., I never had conceived it my duty to vote for the appropriation of large sums of money to be frittered away and applied to objects of trifling importance. Such, I conceive, will be the application of the fund contemplated by the bill now under consideration.

Internal Improvement.

The bill, as originally reported, said Mr. S., created a fund of six hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, or pledged the interest of eleven millions, in perpetuity, for internal improvements, to be applied as Congress might hereafter direct, and the gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) stated some of the objects to which the fund would, he presumed, be applied. Sir, had the bill retained that shape, the fund might have been applied to great national objects. I will mention some of them. The first in consequence, in my estimation, is, to connect the water of Lake Erie, by a canal, with the Hudson. The importance of such a work must present itself to every well-informed mind. Unless such a canal be made, the produce of the Lakes and of the rich lands of New York, bordering on the St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario, must find a market at Montreal, and the advantages, of course, of a great proportion of our country, must go to Great Britain and her colonies. A canal from Lake Erie would draw the greater portion of the products to New York. No sum, Mr. Speaker, could be too great to effect an object so grand, so splendid. This bill will afford a trifle only towards it. Another great object would be to construct canal locks around the falls of the Ohio, by which a certain navigation would be secured to ships and vessels descending that river, to the great advantage of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and the Western States. There are other great national objects, said Mr. S., which are familiar to all, and which might have been perfected if the bill had remained as originally reported, but which will be paralyzed by the bill on the table. Let us take a view of it.

The bill, as amended, appropriates a capital of near eleven millions, or $650,000 per annum, to be divided among the States annually, in proportion to the number of their Representatives in the House of Representatives, and the proportion of each to be applied within the respective States in such manner as Congress may hereafter direct. This, said Mr. S., appears at first view plausible and fair; what, however, will be its operation? New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, and South Carolina, never can have any increase of members on this floor: they will increase in numbers, but such will be the superior increase in other States, that I must consider those States stationary as to representation in Congress. Thus, while other States will, at every census, increase their proportion of the fund, the proportion to those States will decrease. Maryland will draw for four years from the fund, a proportion as 9 to 183—or $21,968 each year. In 1820 a new census will be taken, after which her proportion will probably fall, by the great increase of New York and the Western States, to $25,000; I fear to a less amount; and in ten years more, to perhaps $15,000. The other stationary States which I have named will be similarly situated. Delaware will now divide

$7,100 annually. This bill cuts her off effectually from every ray of hope of ever effecting her grand plan of connecting the bays of Chesapeake and Delaware. Pennsylvania will scarcely apply her proportion out of her own State; she will have projects enough within her own territory. I will mention one: a canal to connect the Susquehanna with the Schuylkill, which will divert her attention from the cut from one bay to the other. New Jersey has flattered herself with a canal from the Delaware to the Raritan. This bill, said Mr. S., is a death-blow to such hopes. That object is one of great national importance, and this bill grants New Jersey about $24,000 per annum for four years, and perhaps fifteen thousand dollars for ten years thereafter, to perfect a work that would be eminently useful to this nation, especially in war, and which cannot be executed for less than two millions of dollars.

Gentlemen may flatter themselves, said Mr. S., that the liberality of Congress will hereafter grant sums specifically for an object so highly important. Not so, Mr. Speaker; this bill will be the precedent that the Western and large States will cling to, and never hereafter will they apply a sum of money to an improvement in any State without requiring for themselves a sum in proportion to their numbers. By this bill the stationary States are making themselves completely tributary to those which may be the increasing States. The sum proposed for Maryland, as already stated, is nearly $32,000; not enough to make four miles of a good turnpike road. In how many parts is this pittance to be divided? How many will be the claimants? Baltimore will want it perhaps for two turnpike roads and three bridges over the Susquehanna, the Susquehanna Canal Company, and for the road to Washington. The Potomac Canal Company and the canal between the two bays will also have their claims. All of these are different interests; all will think they have equal claims; all will have their agents here soliciting the members. What a time we shall have! Sir, said Mr. S., you are about to throw the apple of discord into this House—one that will never decay. Instead of members attending to the public business hereafter, they will be constantly engaged in bargaining, trucking, buying, and selling; and he that can go into market with twenty-nine votes in his hand will make the best bargain. Sir, I look with disgust at the picture before my eyes that will result from this bill.

The gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) has mentioned as his main object, a great turnpike road from Maine to Georgia. The gentleman, said Mr. S., knows little, if he believes that the money will be so applied. Many of the States have made their roads and bridges. That leading route brings no commerce in all its long line to the seaports. Does the gentleman, asked Mr. S., really believe that the members from Virginia will apply the proportion of that State to the road from Alexandria to Richmond? If he does he deceives himself. If they expend the amount on roads let him look West; there is the direction.

H. OF R.

Not a dollar will be spent on Virginia in any other direction. Norfolk must be very adroit, if any part will be expended on the canal of the Dismal Swamp, a canal of great national importance, and which this bill will, I fear, effectually deprive of any important national aid.

Mr. Speaker, I frankly confess, that I would greatly prefer being silent on the subject of roads and canals during the present session. We have just emerged from an expensive war, the charges of which are not yet known. By the next session we shall have a more correct view of our finances. The view we now have is on estimates. Let us first pass the bill for establishing a sinking fund. Let us have time to know the operation of the new tariff of duties laid the last year. Let us know the amount of militia and other claims of the States, and the arrearages for army accounts. All these can be known by the next session, when, if we have the means, gentlemen will find me, said Mr. S., as liberal as any member of this House to promote objects of internal improvement, tending to great national purposes. Have we the means now to meet this bill? This is a question, continued he, which the gentleman ought to have asked himself before he brought in the bill. Nay, sir, it was incumbent on him to show that we could spare the amount. A sum such as $650,000 per annum will sink deep into our finances. Sir, said he, the great objects of Congress, I thought, on its meeting, was to establish the means to pay off the national debt, to lessen the public expenditures, and, if we had means to spare, to repeal such of the internal taxes as are obnoxious and unequal—such as the stamp act and the tax on licenses. These two taxes are unequal and unjust in their operation; the stamp tax falls on the necessitous, and is evaded in some cities; the retailer's license is paid by many poor people, who, perhaps, have not a capital of $500, some not $100. My opinion is, said Mr. S., that those taxes ought to be repealed before we apply so large a sum as $650,000 per annum to a new and untried object. If we pass this bill, we must keep on all the internal taxes, and reduce the sum which the Committee of Ways and Means have proposed for the payment of the national debt. Sir, I have said, that the gentleman ought to have shown the means of meeting this large appropriation. I made a motion in the Committee of Ways and Means to repeal the internal taxes; but, on examination, I found (on the data given by the Secretary of the Treasury) that it could not be done, unless the sum for the Sinking Fund should be lessened; I, therefore, consented to waive the subject until the next session. Gentlemen flatter themselves, that savings may be made in our expenditures. Some will be made; but not to an amount greater than will meet outstanding claims of States and individuals, not yet settled, and new plans of expending money, with which your table is now covered.

Mr. Speaker, I have examined the finances, with a view to the bill now under discussion. The data I have taken is the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the Sinking Fund, bottomed on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which it will be recollected the Secretary charges no interest on the capital of seven millions vested in the bank, because he presumed the dividend would meet the amount of that interest; he also gives credit for the bonus of $1,500,000 from the bank, in three annual payments, as it becomes due. The result of my examination is, as stated in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, that there will be in the Treasury—

On the 1st day of January, 1818	$3,650,000
Deduct one year's interest, payable on the $7,000,000 bank stock in 1817, at 5 per cent	350,000
	3,300,000
Revenue of 1817, agreeably to the Secretary's report	16,250,000
	19,550,000

Deduct therefrom—

Permanent expenses of 1818, less four millions, to be advanced from the Sinking Fund of 1818, to purchase debt in 1817	18,500,000
Interest on bank stock for 1818	356,000
	18,850,000
Surplus	700,000

In the Treasury, 1st of January, 1819	700,000
Permanent revenue per Secretary's report	22,250,000
	22,950,000

Deduct therefrom—

Permanent annual expense	22,500,000
Interest on bank stock	350,000
Ditto on bonus, 500,000 paid in this year	30,000
	22,880,000
Surplus	70,000
Permanent revenue in 1820	22,250,000
	22,320,000

Permanent expenses for 1820	22,500,000
Interest on bank stock	350,000
Ditto on bonus, one million	60,000
	22,910,000
Deficiency	590,000
	$22,910,000

It is, however, expected that the sales of land will give more than its usual amount in 1820, but not more, in my opinion, than will be met by new and increased expenditure. Under this view of our finances I cannot, at this time, said Mr. S., consent to any new plan of expending the public money. My great object is to pay off the national debt, which the plan proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means will do in twelve years, and if there shall appear to be a surplus when we next meet, let us first repeal the internal taxes; they were war taxes, which were passed to continue a certain time, and no longer; you are pledged, in good faith to the people to repeal them, as soon as you have the means from other objects to meet the necessary expenses of Government. Be just; pay your promise to the people before you pledge such an amount forever as $650,000 per annum. If you pass the bill, the internal taxes either must remain upon the people, or you must lessen the sum proposed to extinguish the national debt. Sir, a gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. DICKENS,) moved a resolution this morning to repeal the tax on salt. It failed. It happens very extraordinarily that the duty on salt amounts annually to $650,000, the precise sum that this bill appropriates for roads and canals; and I rather think it probable that the people in North Carolina would prefer a bill to repeal the duty of twenty cents per bushel on salt, to the bill for expending the whole amount received from that duty.

It has been said, continued Mr. S., that the great public road which connects the Ohio with the Atlantic States, has been highly beneficial to Maryland, and particularly to Baltimore. It is true; and permit me to boast a little on that subject. Sir, that great and important road was obtained by the constant and unremitted exertions of Governor Worthington, and Mr. Morrow, of Ohio, and my humble endeavors, against the wishes of the highest and deservedly the most popular character in the United States. If, Mr. Speaker, I had never done any other beneficial act to recommend myself to my constituents, that one action ought, and, I believe, would, give me their support and confidence. But, sir, at whose expense has that road been made? At the charge of the United States? No. You know, Mr. Speaker, that a compact was made between the United States and Ohio, when that State was received into the Union, by which the State of Ohio was bound to levy no tax on the public land nor on any land sold by the United States, for five years after such sale; the United States bound itself to pay to the State of Ohio, five per cent. of the proceeds of all land sold within that State, of which two per cent. was to be applied to the making a turnpike road from the river to the Atlantic waters. It is that fund alone which furnishes the means to make the road from Cumberland to the Ohio, and the fund is amply sufficient to complete it. The aid given by the United States is to advance money in anticipation of the fund. I believe that full one-third the advance has already been reimbursed. The Cumberland road has been made in part, and the residue is progressing, by the citizens of Maryland, at their own expense, to Cumberland, a distance, I believe, of 160 or 170 miles. There the United States have commenced. The road runs about twenty-five or thirty miles through Maryland, and then runs through Pennsylvania and Virginia to the Ohio.

In fine, I am for appropriating our funds, when we can act advisably on the subject, to the making such roads and canals as have for their object national advantages; not to be divided into small and insignificant sums, to be applied to objects within the power and means of the States individually.

Mr. SHEFFEY, of Virginia, said that he had intended, before the final question was taken on the bill before the House, to have given his opinion somewhat in detail on its merits; but the lateness of the hour, as well as the persuasion that the time of the House was precious, induced him to forbear going into the subject at large. He would confine himself to a few general principles, which he thought applicable to the question before the House.

The subject, said Mr. S., presents two propositions for our consideration: First—Does the Constitution authorize Congress to make provision by law to attain objects such as are contemplated by this bill? Secondly—If such power exists, is it expedient to exercise it now, and in the manner proposed? On the first question, though I accord in sentiment with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) that we have the power, yet I do not agree with him that we derive it from that clause in the Constitution to which he referred it; that which empowers Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare." I do not view the latter sentence as containing a distinct substantive grant of power. It must be taken in connexion with the other provisions in the Constitution; and, in my opinion, ought to be understood in this sense—that Congress shall have power to levy money "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," so far as the common defence and general welfare is confided to them by this Constitution.

If we possess the power in question, it must be, as incidental to some one or more of the powers expressly delegated to us; as an instrument the more effectually to attain some or all of the great ends for which this Government was instituted. It is here where those who contend for the existence of this power, and those who deny it, separate. It has been said by some, and stated to-day by an honorable gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. PITKIN) as his opinion, that Congress could employ no means to carry into effect the delegated powers, but such as were absolutely necessary. [Mr. PRYOR here rose and said he had stated it not as his own, but the opinion of others, with which he disagreed.] Mr. SHEFFEY said he was glad to find he was mistaken. It was an opinion, however, seriously entertained, and often uttered on this floor. If such is really the fact, then this Government is without any power whatever. As in the physical and moral, so in the political world, there is scarcely an end which may not be attained by different means. If the objects confided to you can be effected only by such means as are absolutely necessary, how will you effect any? If, to execute the power "to lay and collect taxes," you direct that my land shall be sold for non-payment of a direct tax, I may say the law is unconstitutional, because it is not absolutely necessary that you should sell my land: you might sell my house, or obtain the tax by any other means; all of them, perhaps, equally certain to attain the end, but none of them absolutely necessary. If to execute and provide proper sanctions to your laws, embracing subjects expressly delegated to Congress, you impose imprisonment on the delinquent, may he not say that you are guilty of usurpation; that the privation of his liberty is not absolutely necessary to execute your laws? In fact, sir, there is no imaginable case where this doctrine would not unnerve you, and render this Government, formed for great purposes, and ostensibly invested with great powers, utterly imbecile, and a subject of derision and contempt.

Those who formed this Government, acted like wise and practical statesmen. They designated the objects of your jurisdiction; the means which you should employ to secure those objects, they did not, because they could not prescribe. They left the selection of the instruments to those who should be appointed to use them. They invested you with all the means "necessary and proper" to carry into effect the delegated powers, and left you to determine what was "necessary and proper." Hence I contend that if the object itself is within your control, a measure which tends to promote or effectuate it is not limited by any Constitutional restriction, but is a matter of discretion, for the abuse of which we are responsible to our constituents, as in those cases where the power is unquestionable.

I had intended to have shown how the provisions of this bill tended to promote many of the objects which have been expressly confided to this Government. For the reasons already mentioned, I shall confine myself to one or two topics. The common defence, involving protection against domestic violence, and security from foreign invasion, are objects not only confided to us, but constitute high and commanding duties. To render defence against foreign invasion (which, in its very nature, supposes the enemy to have the command on the ocean) effectual, is it not necessary that you should have all imaginable facilities in collecting and concentrating your forces; transporting subsistence, arms, and munitions; and maintaining the communication between different important and commanding positions? And how is this to be effected? There is but one answer: by means of roads and canals. Is this Government, then, to be dependent for these indispensable facilities on the authorities of the States, who may or may not provide them? The affirmative implies that the duty of defence has been imposed upon us; but the power and means to render it effectual, are left in other hands. For myself I cannot yield to a construction which would render this Constitution utterly destitute of wisdom. So far as this object is concerned, our powers, in my opinion, are ample; and this object alone would authorize us to establish a line of roads and canals along the whole of our maritime frontier; not to be delayed until imperious necessity demanded their use, for the purposes mentioned; but to be proceeded upon whenever it should be deemed expedient.

But there is another primary power delegated to Congress, in the execution of which the means provided by this bill are equally "necessary and proper," and admit of a more extensive scope. By the second clause of the enumerated legislative powers, Congress are authorized "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and between the several States, and with the Indian tribes." What is the nature of the powers here vested? The regulations of commerce with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes, have been universally considered as exclusive powers vested in the General Government. No State has pretended to interfere with either. To regulate commerce between the several States, in its nature must be exclusive. The conflicting legislation of the States would destroy the uniformity which this clause was intended to establish. Besides, two or more States could not regulate the commerce between them, but by compact, which they are expressly forbidden from entering into, without the consent of Congress.

If the power to regulate commerce between the States is entirely and exclusively transferred from the States, who formerly possessed it, to the United States, I think it fair to infer that Congress now possess all the power on this subject which all the States separately possessed when they consented to relinquish it; or in other words, that, with the power to regulate commerce between themselves, the States transferred all the means which they might have used in execution of that power, as incidental. Could the States, before they divested themselves of the power, in order to facilitate commerce and intercourse with one another, have cut canals and made roads? Could two or more of them have entered into compacts providing for such facilities? It seems to me too clear for denial. Unless, then, it can be shown that the United States received the primary power, and that the States retained the means which they possessed to examine it while in their hands, the inference is strong, if not irresistible, that the power and the means have been transferred to us.

It is said that the exercise of this power will conflict with the policy of the States, and interfere with their designs of internal improvement. This certainly is not an argument to prove our want of power. Wherever there is concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject, such interference may and will happen. Such concurrent jurisdiction does exist in many other cases. Should any conflict arise, the Constitution has established you as the supreme authority; to which not only the laws but the constitution of the States must yield. But the power for which I contend as belonging to this Government, if properly exercised, will rarely conflict with any State purpose. Their power is to regulate, facilitate and promote trade and intercourse between the several parts of the same State; ours is to effect like objects between the several members of the Union. The one purpose is local, confined to the interest of each State; the other is general, embracing the interest of the whole.

It may be said that the States by providing facilities of intercourse, each between its several parts, thereby effect the objects which I assign to the United States. But is the commerce and communication between the several members (so important to strengthen the bond of union) to be left to the States, whose jealousies and desire of aggrandizement in many cases would lead them to obstruct it? It is notorious that the power to regulate commerce between the several States, as conferred on Congress, grew out of the measures which had been adopted by several States, tending to restrict and lessen the commercial intercourse between them and other States. The States will be partial to their own towns and ports, and they will give facilities to draw the trade of the interior to them, though its natural current (which they will obstruct by all possible means) would lead it elsewhere. This is the natural effort of the spirit of State aggrandizement and local jealousy. With us it cannot make the same progress, because we superintend the interest of the whole. There are some objects vitally interesting to several States, to the accomplishment of which private means and enterprise are perhaps not competent, and which it would be unjust to expect to be effected by the State who has the local jurisdiction; such, for instance, as the cutting a canal round the rapids of the Ohio. All the immense region above and below is equally interested in effecting this great object. Shall Kentucky or Indiana alone bear the burden, when many others are alike benefitted by the result? Can those States effect it whose territories are distant? Certainly not. Who, then, is to provide for this great object? The Government of the United States, who has under its exclusive control the commerce between the several States.

It remains to be considered whether, by a fair construction, the words "to regulate" commerce between the several States confer the power to afford it all reasonable facilities. I understand the word "regulate," as used in the present instance, to imply an entire control over the subject in all its relations. Such has been the uniform construction of this Government as administered by all parties. The same clause which gives to Congress the power to "regulate" commerce between the several States, gives the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes. Under the first of these powers, Congress, to give external commerce all possible facilities, have erected light-houses, piers, and beacons; they have established regulations for seamen in the merchant service; they have levied a capitation tax on these seamen, contrary to the rule of the Constitution, (as being a case not embraced by it,) to create a hospital fund for the sick and disabled. Congress, under this power, have suspended commerce entirely. Under the power to "regulate" commerce with the Indian tribes, trading houses have been erected and roads opened. Did any person ever object to these acts (the ones suspending commerce excepted) as transcending the Constitutional powers of this Government? For myself I can say I never heard of any such objection. This detail contains a practical construction of the word "regulate," and furnishes, moreover, a complete answer to the idea often repeated on this floor, that we can employ only such means as directly tend to execute the delegated powers; that we dare not, without usurpation, depart one step out of a direct line in moving towards our object.

I cannot subscribe to a doctrine which we have heard from a respectable source in the course of this discussion, that the consent of the States is necessary to enable us to make roads and canals. If we have the power at all, it is the supreme power, which will execute itself, not only without such consent, but in opposition to the will of the States. The consent of the States certainly can give us no power where the Constitution has not vested it, otherwise it might happen that we might do in one State what we could not do in another. The idea that the consent of the States is necessary, arises from blending two distinct subjects. If the exclusive jurisdiction over the roads and canals when constructed, should be desired by the United States, the States must first relinquish their jurisdiction. But this has no connexion with the act of making the roads and canals. You build custom-houses without the consent of the States; but their territorial sovereignty over them is not lost; all crimes committed there are cognizable by the State authorities. So it would be in relation to roads and canals made by your authority.

On the second question, embraced by the measure before you, viz., the expediency, I shall be very concise. To me it appears obvious, that by creating facilities of mutual intercourse, you bring the different parts of this extensive country nearer together. The inhabitants of the different portions, by becoming better acquainted, will become better friends. Local ambition, jealousy, and animosity will be lessened; the Union will be strengthened, because national benefit will be added to national security, as an additional motive for us to remain one people. But the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has given us a detail of our finances, from which he infers, that however useful and proper, in itself, this measure may be, our means do not authorize the undertaking at this time. I will not now enter into the question whether his inference is correct, though I incline to think that the honorable gentleman has given a picture of our resources too unfavorable. But I would rather retrench in other expenditures than permit this great object to be neglected. Reduce your army, introduce a system of rigid and well-regulated economy (not parsimony) into the administration of your finances, instead of the waste and disorder which now prevail, and your means for effecting the purpose contemplated by this bill will be ample. Indeed, so important is this subject to the country, in my opinion, that rather than see it fail, I would consent to borrow money at eight per cent., or lay a tax on the country. The capacity of the people to pay taxes would be increased in proportion as the price of transportation of their products to market would be diminished—a result which must follow a well-organized and liberal system of internal improvement.

Mr. YATES, of New York, said, after what had been already said, he had not that excessive vanity, and he hoped he never would have, to suppose that he could with patience be heard by the House, in recurring to those objects of great national concern which had been so ably and powerfully presented. The advantage of free, easy, and unrestrained intercourse, its effect upon the national character, upon its wealth, resources and prosperity—upon mutual attachments, and attachment to the Government of the country, the facility of defence in time of war, and the propriety and necessity of using the resources of the nation for the purpose of accomplishing those desirable objects, were all of this description. Contrary therefore to his original intentions, he would confine the few observations he was about to make to the practicability of effecting some objects for which the appropriation was intended. To the one with which he was most acquainted, and which he believed was acknowledged to be of primary importance, he would particularly confine himself. The canal from Erie to the Hudson had been a subject of much conversation for many years—by some it was supposed chimerical, by others practicable; but at such an enormous expense, that it ought not, in the present state of our country, to be attempted. He believed neither supposition well founded. There was no country in the world, perhaps, where a canal of that extent could with so much ease be made. Portions of it could be finished, and the Government and country derive advantages from it, without its immediate continuation throughout the whole distance. The commencement of operations was not therefore liable to the same objections which might with justice be made to many other similar projects, namely, that it must be completed before it could be used, and an abandonment of it would be the loss of all the money and labor expended. A day or two previous he had provided himself with a map, with an intention to enter fully into the discussion; but the House was exhausted and impatient, and he would not venture to detain them. He referred however to the map, on which the route of the canal was nearly given—sufficiently accurate to show its general course. Although the late survey somewhat varied from the one laid down on the map, throwing it more south, it would be seen, that if the canal were continued from Rome, west, a distance of a little more than forty miles, it would intersect a number of streams, some of these sufficiently large for feeders, and at the termination it would reach the outlets of the Seneca and Cayuga Lakes. This would at once divert the trade of the country on the borders of those lakes and near them from its present course. The House could form an opinion, from the extent of country and its population, what that trade must probably be, including the intermediate country between Rome and these lakes; the greater proportion of the surplus produce of which can with more ease and less expense be sent to a Canada market than to New York. Oneida, Madison, Onondaga, Cayuga, and Seneca counties, containing nearly three million three hundred thousand acres, and rising of one hundred and thirty thousand inhabitants—the whole of this country very fertile, and capable of sustaining a much larger population than it now has—great part of it still a wilderness, but settling rapidly. The natural and least expensive channel for the exports of almost all this region, is down the Oswego river to Ontario, and thence down the St. Lawrence. It is a subject which ought not to be considered lightly; it is interesting to every American; it involves not only pecuniary considerations, but the attachments and affections of the people. He did not believe there was any part of the United States where the attachments of the people were more firmly rivetted to their Government. They had had during the late war, throughout the whole of this country on to Lake Erie, repeated occasions to give evidences of this. They had always been ready and willing to perform their duty as citizens of the American Republic. But it becomes, notwithstanding, necessary, on the part of Government, to use every exertion for the purpose of removing obstacles to the performance of duty, or temptations to swerve from it. The expense of the part of the canal which would be sufficient to divert this portion of the trade, is indeed trifling, compared to the object. It requires nothing more than the effort; every difficulty will vanish. He had this morning been informed by a gentleman from Massachusetts, that the Middlesex canal, from Boston to Merrimack, cost $17,000 per mile. This was cut for some distance through rock. The one he now spoke of, would be cut through a soft soil; the ground was entirely level; the only lock requisite, for a distance of about forty miles of it, would be at Rome. From the most accurate information that could be obtained, this part of the canal can be constructed and completed for less than $10,000 per mile; and he was well assured this was a larger sum than it would actually cost. There ought, therefore, to be no hesitation, if the Government have the power, and of this he had no doubt, to do something for the promotion of so useful, so advantageous an operation. But this was a small portion of country; the extension of it to Erie is of the greatest consequence.

He had said before, but would repeat it—in that also the United States had an interest on the score of pecuniary advantage from their land; and its actual increase in value, in consequence of these operations, if they shall be completed, will be much more than sufficient to pay the whole expense of the work. As an expenditure, therefore, from which they may expect to derive an actual per centage, it would be advantageous. He had given the population of the counties which would be affected by this canal, as far as the Seneca outlet. These people had in some measure the choice of two markets. The expense, indeed, of transportation to New York, was greater than to Montreal—yet, if there were obstacles in their way to the Canada market, they would then use the other, although at somewhat greater expense; but that was not the case with the more Western counties. The counties of Ontario, Genesee, Niagara, Cataraugus, and Chatauqua, contain more than four millions five hundred thousand acres, and more than sixty-three thousand inhabitants. The exports were rapidly increasing, and without the canal they had no other outlet. These people were subject to the harassing policy of the Canadian Government, without remedy, and must become more and more interested in their measures. He held in his hand a letter which had not been intended to be used for this purpose, but which contained information useful to show to what extent our people would become, without some effectual measures on our part, dependent on the Canadas for their market. The letter was directed to his colleague, (Mr. Brooks,) from whom he had just received it. From the port of Sodus only, on Lake Ontario, there were exported, during the last year, for the Canada market—he named a number of articles of produce, among them were ten thousand barrels of flour, a very considerable quantity of wheat, corn, potash, &c. From this, an opinion could be formed of the value of this trade, and of the influence it would hereafter give the Government of Canada in this part of the country. There are, indeed, other objects of great importance, but there are none which so strongly require the attention of Government in every point of view. It was not his intention to enter into an examination of the subject farther. He would only observe that whether the Congress aided or not, he hoped and verily believed that the State of New York would ultimately finish the work without such assistance. Great and important as it is in a national view, yet, if no assistance could be given towards it, he hoped and trusted she would not be wanting in justice to herself, and use her ample means for the accomplishment of an object demanded by every principle of national or State policy.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, next rose. He said, that he should not have addressed the House at this late hour, had he not been influenced, as well by the importance of the subject, as by the principles which had been assumed, in the progress of the discussion; he would, however, promise not to occupy a moment of their time, more than was indispensably necessary to explain his views.

He said, it was certainly true, that internal improvement, upon an extended scale, by means of artificial roads and inland navigation, was in itself a desirable object; it was desirable, because it would facilitate means of intercourse between the several States; it was desirable, because by diminishing the expense of transportation, and enlarging the market, for the various products of the country, it would enhance their value, and thus augment the totality of the wealth of the nation; and indeed it might be productive of many other advantages, which had been portrayed, in such glowing colors, by the member from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.) He thought it, however, well worthy of the serious consideration of the House, how far it was prudent, under the existing circumstances of the country, to embark in the scheme, proposed by the bill upon the table; and especially, to the extent which that bill proposed. He would call the attention of the House for a moment, to the amount of the contemplated appropriation. It consisted in the United States' bonus and dividends in the Bank of the United States; the bonus was one million and a half of dollars, payable in three instalments; the dividends were of course somewhat uncertain; but as the United States had a capital of seven million of dollars in the Bank, if the profits of that institution were only equal to the average of State banks, (and he thought it was obvious they would be greater,) the dividends would amount to $700,000 per annum. An appropriation, then, of the bonus and the dividends as they should annually accrue, for a period of twenty years, would amount to an immense sum; he had not made the calculation, but he said, it seemed to be agreed amongst political arithmeticians, that one per cent. of any given capital, annually appropriated, and operating at an interest of five per cent. upon a compound principle, and applied to the capital only, would extinguish it in a period of thirty-seven years. Taking this then, as a datum, and recollecting that the sum here would be at an interest of six per cent., he thought it probable, speaking from conjecture, and without the aid of actual calculation, that the proposed appropriation would, in its aggregate result, upon the principles which he had before stated, be equal to the extinguishment of about $40,000,000 of our national debt. It was for the House to decide, whether they were prepared to go to this extent; it was for them to say, even viewing the question in the light of expediency only, whether it was better to apply the amount of the proposed appropriation to the payment of the public debt, or to the execution of the great scheme of internal improvement, contemplated by the bill.

But, he said, he would not dwell longer upon this view of the subject; because, whatever might be the expediency of the measure, whatever advantage it might promise, he should feel himself constrained to vote against the bill, upon the ground, that it embraced objects not within the sphere of the Constitutional powers of Congress.

Mr. B. said, it was with real reluctance that he entered into this part of the subject; because it was extremely difficult, at the present day, to take any ground in relation to that question, which had not been in some degree pre-occupied, on former occasions, which were memorable in the history of this country; but he felt it to be a duty which he owed to himself, to state to the House his construction of the Federal Constitution; not only because it influenced his course upon the present bill, but because it had influenced him upon many other important occasions on which he had been called to act, since he had been a member of this House. If, in doing this, he should occasionally tread in the footsteps of those who had gone before him, he must find his apology in this: That when the same text occurred, it could not be explained, without resorting in some degree to the same commentary.

The State governments, Mr. B. said, were abundantly competent to all the purposes of ordinary legislation; to the protection of the lives, liberties, and property of the people; and to their own internal order, improvement, and prosperity. For what purpose, then, he asked, was a Federal Government necessary? He answered, that it was necessary for the purpose of concentrating the strength and resources of the several States, with a view to their defence against foreign danger; it was necessary for the regulation of foreign commerce, and all those external objects which constitute what are usually called the foreign relations of a country. There were also some few internal objects, which, by reason of their very great importance or the necessity for uniformity, called for the superintendency of a Federal Government; such, for example, amongst others, as the regulation of commerce amongst the several States, the coining of money, the establishment of a uniform rule of naturalization.

In conformity with these ideas, the Constitution had delegated to Congress not a general but a partial legislative power; comprehending, indeed, all the external objects of the Government, but only a few specified objects of an internal character, distinctly enumerated. As, however, there was a division of power between the Federal and State Governments, in relation to objects of the kind which he had just mentioned, such was the jealous caution against any possible misconstruction, that it was expressly declared by the tenth amendment, that "all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, were retained to the States, respectively, or to the people."

Whether, then, reference was had to the purposes for which the Federal Government was instituted, or to this explicit declaration, this principle resulted—that when a member of the National Legislature was called on to act, he occupied ground directly the reverse of what he would occupy were he a member of a State Legislature:—there he would be able to do whatever was not prohibited; here he can do nothing but that which is authorized. This principle had been the polar star, by which he had uniformly been governed; and not being able, by the best lights of his judgment, to find in the Constitution any grant of the power proposed to be exercised by the bill upon the table, he felt himself constrained to vote against it. But gentlemen, yielding to the force of the principle which he had just laid down, had entered into an elaborate argument to prove that the Constitution had delegated to Congress the power of making roads and canals. And here, Mr. B. said, at the very threshold, he could not forbear to remark that scarcely any two gentlemen who had spoken upon the subject had agreed as to the provision of the Constitution from which this power was derivable. From this circumstance alone, he deduced an argument of some weight against them; for if the advocates of the measure, whilst they united in the result, differed essentially amongst themselves in their own principles; if one derived the power from one clause, and another from a different one, this indicated at least such a degree of doubt upon the subject, as should make the House pause, and deliberate seriously, before it adopted a conclusion derived from such different sources, and supported by such contradictory principles.

But, Mr. B. said, that he would now proceed directly to the question, and would endeavor to show that the proposed power was not sustainable upon any of the principles which had been assumed as the basis of its support.

Great reliance had been placed, in the course of the argument, upon the language, in which the power "to lay and collect taxes," &c., was expressed; particularly the words, "to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." If he understood the argument, this broad proposition had been assumed—that Congress, having power to raise money by laying and collecting taxes, might appropriate the money thus raised to any object which, in their opinion, would contribute to the common defence and general welfare; provided the purpose to which it was appropriated was not prohibited in the Constitution. It had been said that roads and canals would contribute to the common defence and general welfare; and hence it had been concluded that Congress had therefore power to make them. If this construction were to prevail, he asked what would become of the specific enumeration of powers which immediately followed the clause in question? Did that enumeration mean anything? He could not suppose that any gentleman would contend it was inserted without meaning. What, then, did it mean? He thought it was obviously designed as a limitation upon the previous general language which had been used; that is, that the "common defence and general welfare" were the end to be obtained. The various enumerated powers which followed, were the means by which they were to be attained. If any other construction than this prevailed, the consequence would be, that a Government which, upon the face of its own charter, was declared to be limited to certain definite objects, would in reality become almost wholly unlimited; for, with the exception of a few prohibitions, (and they were but few,) Congress might appropriate money to any object which, in their opinion, would promote the "general welfare." What was this but a substitution of legislative discretion for Constitutional right?

The power "to establish post offices and post roads," had also been relied upon in justification of this bill. The first answer which presented itself to this argument was, that this power was not even pretended to embrace canals; and as to the roads for which it provided, he had always considered that nothing else was intended by it, than an authority to designate and fix the mail routes. It must be observed, that the words were not to cut or to make post roads, but to establish them. He thought the obvious meaning of the terms used, justified his constructions. Another argument in favor of this construction was this: at the time when the Constitution was formed, the State governments then were, and long had been in being; and having charge of their own internal improvement, they either then had, or it might be calculated upon that they would make such roads, as the necessity or convenience of their citizens rendered necessary. Considered in this point of view, it was not necessary to give to Congress the power to make roads; all that was requisite was to reserve to them the right of passage, adding such roads as the States had or might make; that right is involved in the power to establish post roads. He would only add that the House had been informed, by the venerable member from Massachusetts, that at an early period after the formation of the Constitution, this power was understood to convey only the authority to designate and fix routes for the mail; this information also went to fortify his construction. There were, he believed, only two other powers to which the right to make roads and canals had been referred, not as being expressly granted by them, but as being incident to them, and, therefore, granted by implication. These were, the power "to regulate commerce amongst the several States," and the power "to raise and support armies." Upon the subject of incidental powers, as growing out of what was generally called the residuary clause in the Constitution, he would remark, that to justify the exercise of a power not granted, as an incident to one which was granted, it was not enough to show that, by indirect and remote consequences, it might conduce to the execution of the granted power; such a construction would break down all the barriers of the Constitution; it must be shown that it had an immediate, direct, and obvious relation to the power granted. He would exemplify his idea by a case which he would put. Congress had power "to lay and collect taxes;" but, as assessment was necessary to collection, therefore they had power to appoint assessors, and, upon the same principle, collectors also; he was satisfied that the power of making roads and canals could not be assumed as incidental to either of the powers which had been mentioned; either according to the definition, or the exemplification which he had given.

Internal Improvement.

H. OF R

To regulate, was to prescribe, to direct; the power, therefore, "to regulate commerce amongst the several States," meant the right to prescribe the manner, terms, and conditions, on which that commerce should be carried on. This, he thought, was the plain meaning of the terms; but he referred also to the history of the times, and to the local circumstances of the United States, in proof of this idea. Some States were advantageously situated for commerce, others were much less so; it was apprehended, that the desire of the first to make the most of their advantages would cause them to establish partial commercial regulations; the latter class, or States less advantageously situated, would endeavor to escape from their operation, hence were feared jealousies and feuds amongst them; to avoid these evils, to put commerce amongst the States upon a footing of equality, it was thought right to give to the Federal Government the power to regulate it; and in further confirmation of this idea, even the Federal Government was forbidden, by the Constitution, from giving, "by any regulation of commerce, a preference to the ports of one State over those of another." His colleague (Mr. SHERFF) had contended that, before the formation of the Constitution, the States had the power to regulate commerce; that if they had thought proper to facilitate it by roads and canals, they would have had the power to have done so. He had said, that the power to regulate commerce being exclusive, whatever belonged to the States had been delegated to Congress; hence he inferred that, as the States might have made roads and canals, as incident to the regulation of commerce, that power having been granted to Congress, the incident passed with the principal; and that, therefore, they might make roads and canals. The error of this argument consisted in this: that the power to make roads and canals existed in the State governments, not merely as an incident to any other power, but as a substantive, independent attribute of sovereignty. His conclusion, therefore, which depended mainly upon the assumed principle, that the power of making roads and canals was incident to the regulation of commerce, as this principle failed, was, as it respected the premises which remained, if he might be allowed the expression, a non sequitur; in one word, the grant of one independent power did not carry with it another independent power.

The last power by which this bill was attempted to be justified, was the "power to raise and support armies." This, it has been said, involved the incidental power of making roads: he had already expressed his opinion as to the nature and extent of incidental powers; he had already endeavored to give both a definition and exemplification of that kind of powers; he was satisfied that the making of permanent military roads was not incident to the power of raising and supporting armies, according to either of those standards. A remark which he had made in relation to post roads was equally applicable to military roads—the States having already made such roads, as necessity or convenience required; and it being a reasonable expectation that such other roads should be made by them, from a regard to their own interest, as further experience should show to be necessary, the fair presumption was, that it was not within the contemplation of the Constitution, either by express grant or by implication, to give to Congress the power of making permanent roads for the use of the United States. All that the United States wanted with roads for the use of their armies, was a mere right of passage, for which the roads of the States would be sufficient; if, indeed, in time of actual war the cutting of a road were unnecessary to enable our armies to march, he would not deny them the power to do so; but the difference between such a case and the present bill is: the power to make the road being, in the case stated, deduced from the necessity of the occasion, would only be co-extensive with that necessity, and as the one would be temporary, so likewise would the other be; whereas the bill on the table proposed a system under which roads might be made without knowing, other than by conjecture, whether they ever would be used as military roads, under which roads were to be made for commercial purposes; but, above all, roads in which the United States would have not a mere right of passage or temporary use, but a continuing and permanent interest. The difference between these rights was important. Mr. B. would endeavor to show it by a case which he would put. Suppose the United States to determine to turnpike the great road leading from Richmond to Fredericksburg, and for that purpose to establish a company; suppose the Virginia Legislature to incorporate another company to turnpike the same road; in this collision between Federal and State authority, which should prevail? He thought that the difficulty of answering this, and many other questions which might be put upon this subject, was sufficient to show that a doctrine which led to such consequences could not be sustainable.

Mr. T. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, said, the degree of attention which I have had occasion, at various times, to direct to the subject embraced in the bill before the House, induces me to submit a few observations. My intention is, principally, to present to the view of the House some prominent facts—some which have come within my own observation, and others derived from sources which I rely upon as unquestionable authority; of such notoriety, indeed, that their admission is expected without a question; while their application, it is hoped, will be pointedly directed to the subject in discussion. They go, however, wholly in illustration of the expediency of the measure proposed—and here I must be permitted, first, to remark, that I find myself disappointed and unprepared upon another point drawn into argument, which seems to arrest, in the outset, all other considerations—Constitutional exceptions are taken to the measure. This I had not expected upon the present bill, because its provisions seem carefully guarded upon all the points upon which I had apprehended any Constitutional question to arise. In its present form, it proposes nothing without the consent of the States, respectively, and leaves the particular objects and mode of application to a future Congress, which, it is fairly presumed, will keep within the pale of the Constitution. The contrary is certainly not to be presumed. If, then, any provision whatever can be made by law on the subject, requiring an appropriation, this bill must be found free from all Constitutional objection, because it does nothing more than set apart a fund, without making any specific appropriation. I shall not attempt to discuss the question which has arisen, especially after the able discussion it has had already.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) himself, has given a most lucid and eloquent exposition of the Constitution, in the principles of which I am ready to agree with him. I only differ with him in the application of the principle; in the practical detail of measures under the Constitution, and especially in its application to the principle of the bill.

Whenever a Constitutional doubt is opposed to any measure of great importance, I am compelled to recur to the spirit of the Constitution—to the original necessity which at first declared its adoption. What was that, sir? It was that of the common defence of numerous separate communities, requiring a unity of design and of action—trial was made of an ordinary confederacy—experience demonstrated that it could only be held together under the pressure of a defensive war—in times of tranquillity it was found inadequate to the measures requisite to the security of all, and a Federal Government was substituted; to which, by its Constitution, was assigned the all-important powers of peace and war; the raising of armies; the regulation of commerce between the States, and with foreign States. The national revenues and domain were assigned, with those powers, to this Government; and it was charged with the guarantee to each State of a Republican form of government—to regulate the currency, and provide for the common defence and general welfare—in a word, it became necessary to organize a General Government for the general interest, because there are things which no single State can be bound, or under any obligation to do; which no single State has the ability to do, and which things are necessary to the common defence and general welfare. While we confine ourselves to these objects, the Constitution is secure; but when we fail or neglect those great common interests, the spirit of the Constitution is broken—we abandon our trust. As a national Representative, I feel myself bound, by every obligation of duty and allegiance, to provide for the common defence and general welfare—to provide for them in the best manner, by the most appropriate means. I know of no single measure so essentially necessary to these ends, as that which proposes to facilitate the internal intercourse of this great country. Without intercourse, we can have no common interest; and without roads and canals our intercourse is difficult or impracticable.

The gentleman from Virginia admits that, in time of war, such a measure would be proper; but, in time of peace, premature—you know not by what route your enemy may approach. This last position is untenable. The great lines of communication, which are properly national objects, either in peace or war, cannot be mistaken;

they are perfectly within the sphere of both civil and military science. The lines which record our sacred Constitution itself, are less legibly written. These we derive from the agency of our fellow-men; the former are indelibly graven by the finger of God. When war comes, it is then too late for a measure requiring the regular process of well-directed skill, time, and labor. Of this we have lately had a practical and an awful lesson. More than half the disaster, calamity, and expense, of the late war, proceeded from the want of proper facilities of intercourse. I am bold in the assertion, because I have seen and felt its truth, which you find now confirmed by the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, who speaks from the experience of a principal actor in the scenes of that war. But, during the war, you are without a remedy. This, also, I have had occasion to feel. Four years ago, I implored this House, almost on bended knees, to make some exertion suited to the necessity which was manifest. I had witnessed the failure of campaign after campaign, exceeding each other in degrees of disaster, destruction, and expense. We had witnessed the delay of the Ontario fleet; we saw ourselves indebted, after an exertion of skill and enterprise never exceeded, to a rare accident, a Providence, for the completion of the Erie flotilla, in 1813. It never would have sailed, but for a most extraordinary swell of the waters in June. Yet, so pressing and various are the subjects requiring instant attention in time of actual war, that no hope can be reasonably entertained that the necessary improvements can be made at such a period.

Cast but an eye over the extent of territory over which this Republic spreads. The necessity for great exertion to improve the facilities of intercourse is manifest, if we had no experience. But, shall we close our eyes against her recent admonition? Again, look at the numerous streams and waters which traverse this great Continent in all directions. See how great the object—how little of labor nature has left us to perform, compared with it. The invitation is strong: much is promised, and it would be slothful stupidity to leave that little undone. It will not be said we ought to be content with those advantages in the state in which nature gave them. This would be to say the arts are useless—that the corn ought to be eaten in the husk. I have parted from the Constitutional question, as I intended to depart from it, gradually; for not a national necessity exists, which the proposed improvements might remedy, but is a key to unlock the Constitution. Neglect them until the moment of war and peril comes, when the Constitution (because the country also) is in real danger, who would say you had violated that Constitution, had you taken seasonable and provident measures to secure both by providing the facilities of intercourse? One, and only one, word more on this point. I hold this truth to be self-evident, that the Constitution, having given the powers of the States into the hands of this Government for the purpose, it has enjoined upon it also the duty vigilantly to do those things, to wit: which a single State cannot be bound to do; which a single State is unable to do; such thing being evidently requisite for the common defence and general welfare. Are the improvements contemplated by the bill of this description? I might appeal to the interests of peace; I might appeal to the interest of every section of the Union. None can apprehend an evil from such improvements. If any have an apprehension, it is of some dangerous abuse; it is that this Government might go too far. It cannot be an apprehension of danger or disadvantage from such improvement, such as a State cannot effect, one necessary for the general interest, and one made with the consent of the State in which it is situated, and not otherwise.

Will it be said that the Constitution ought first to be constitutionally amended? I think not; because, so prevalent is the opinion that it is as full in this respect as it ought to be, that I doubt whether a salutary amendment can ever be made; and because many believe the practice of resorting to frequent amendments is the most dangerous one you have to apprehend. As it now stands, there is no want of power to do what is necessary for the common defence and general welfare; but, in doing so, circumspection will be observed. You cannot easily effect unnecessary purposes, attended with expense; but, mend or alter that instrument frequently, and can it be for a moment believed that the rights of the States and of the United States can continue mutually secure, if this be a desirable object, as undoubtedly it is?

Having spent some time in meeting the difficulty which, contrary to my expectation, seemed to arrest the bill in the threshold, I shall now proceed briefly to consider the expediency of the measure, which was all I had intended to touch. Its expediency itself has been disputed. The measure is said to be premature—too expensive for the capacity of the country, and especially at a time when internal taxes are resorted to for the discharge of the national debt, and the expenses of the civil list and peace establishment. Whence, I would merely ask, do we derive most of our resources; and whence do gentlemen opposed to this bill tell us we ought to look for the whole of our revenues in time of peace? To foreign commerce. This is the doctrine. How then, upon their own principle, can that revenue be maintained in a ratio increasing with our population, but by making it accessible to the abundant productions of the interior country? This can be effected only by means of good roads, canals, and improved water-courses. By these means, your foreign commerce is enriched, and its revenues augmented; by these, and by these only, is a value given to the soil itself of your public lands, your next great source of revenue—not a nominal or speculative increase of price, but a real augmentation of its intrinsic value. The sober councils of wisdom and experience recommend, above all other measures, those which turn the attention and enterprise of our citizens to their own territory. The people of this country can instantly distinguish between a burdensome expenditure of money, which leaves no trace behind it but the baleful habit of consuming, and the judicious employment of capital in great national works of permanent utility, and indeed of first-rate necessity and importance. Such are the objects of the bill in a pre-eminent degree, because the facility of internal navigation and intercourse promotes all other objects. It gives a due value to every production of land and labor; it affords the advantages of concentration, without the miseries of a crowded population; it saves the labor now exhausted in transportation, and it multiplies exchangeable commodities. Millions of valuable articles have lain dormant ever since the creation, which the means of cheap transportation would bring into useful operation. The greatest portion of our territory is so far interior, that more than one-half of the produce of agriculture itself is expended in carrying the other half to any market, whilst other articles of indefinite amount remain as useless as the waters of the wilderness. Amongst these are timber of all kinds, tar, pitch, ores, plaster, limestone, bricks, clays, marble, freestone, coals, &c. Manures alone would amply compensate the proposed improvements. If revenues alone were the objects to be attained, these improvements would be sufficiently important; yet this consideration is small, compared with the permanent welfare and prosperity of a great and growing population. Districts of country are destitute of timber; others are burdened with its over-abundance. Numerous districts are destitute of coal, plaster, and lime; others possess them to no purpose. Can any man who looks at this great country believe that such improvements would be an expense? As well might the farmer forbear to plant, because he first must plough. No sooner will the plan be fixed, and the National Government engaged in its execution, by the adoption of suitable measures, than the advantages of the system will be felt; and if completed in ten years, the increase of revenue which it will cause, in the same time, will be much more than the whole cost of the works.

Can a well advised system of internal navigation at this day be thought theoretical? By some it will forever be so considered until it shall be carried into effect. Will it be said by any, that such an undertaking would divert labor from useful pursuits, from agriculture, &c.? Experience has proved the contrary. Canals, it is true, we have not; but turnpike roads were as much in theory—were deemed as visionary twenty years ago as canals are now. But roads were undertaken; we now have them extending in all directions, their aggregate many thousand miles. Wherever roads have been actively promoted, agriculture has flourished; wherever they have been neglected, the same slothfulness which neglected them also suffered agriculture to languish. The good effects of roads has exceeded the most sanguine expectation.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) estimates the fund proposed to be set apart at $750,000 annually, and states, that operating as a sinking fund, it would extinguish $45,000,000 of the national debt in twenty years. Now I think it probable that the fund is considerably overestimated. Be this as it may, its effect in twenty years certainly is overrated extremely. Supposing the debt to be at six per cent. per annum interest, it will in twenty years extinguish $28,500,000, provided you add to it annually $1,710,000, the amount of interest upon the whole sum for one year. The steady application, in half-yearly payments, of $750,000 and $1,710,000, making together $2,460,000 for twenty years, will discharge a debt of $28,500,000, and no more. To extinguish, in the same space of time, by similar payments, viz., half-yearly, a debt of $45,000,000, you must provide $1,184,000 and $2,700,000, together $3,884,000, annually, for twenty years. To discharge the first mentioned debt of $28,500,000 in twenty years, you actually pay, in the name of interest, over and above what is paid by the fund of $750,000, the further sum of $34,200,000; and to discharge the last mentioned debt of $45,000,000 in the same time, you actually pay, in the name of interest, $54,000,000 in addition to the aggregate amount of twenty annual payments (made to half-yearly instalments) of $1,184,000 each. The advantage of a sinking fund consists altogether in its faithful and steady application; but in stating the effect of any given sum set apart to be applied to principal, it ought, at the same time, to be distinctly understood, that the interest must be provided annually upon the whole amount until the last dollar shall have been paid off. But whatever effect it might have, it certainly would have none greater than any other equal amount would have, and it ought not to be held for such an object if the debt be not payable, or if the money be really more wanted, or can be more advantageously employed otherwise.

That the improvement of the intercourse is an object of much more importance than the discharge of a debt before it falls due, I believe may be confidently assumed. If its application would increase the revenue more than the expenditure or employment of the capital would subtract from it, then it is more immediately profitable. If the system of improvement by roads, canals, and the removal of obstructions in water-courses was completed, the labor it would save in transportation in one year would more than equal the whole expense. Any man personally acquainted with this country, in its whole extent, and also with the labor of transportation, will readily admit this position; to those unacquainted with either, but more especially to those unacquainted with both, I am aware that the assertion will seem bold and extravagant. Flour in the seaports is now worth $12 or $13 per barrel; west of the mountains it is worth from $6 to $7 and $8. These prices are unusually high, yet half, or nearly half, the quantity is expended in carrying the rest to market. Flour is less ponderous, according to its value, than most other agricultural produce. But the transportation of articles to seaport markets is by far the least portion of transportation—the internal commerce between citizen and citizen being, in all countries, greater by far than the external commerce between the State and foreign States or countries. In Great Britain itself the internal commerce is known to be greater than the foreign as seven to one; in other countries in a much greater proportion. But in these United States, when the extent of territory, when the variety of production and pursuit, is considered, the foreign will bear no comparison with what the internal commerce is or ought to be, but which it cannot be without inland navigation, as well as improved roads. Roads in all countries are necessary; they are more necessary according as the territory is more extensive; and in the same proportion exists the necessity for inland navigation. Within a certain extent land transportation might answer all the purposes of a useful commerce, probably with more advantage than by waters, requiring considerable expense to improve their channels; but in a more enlarged extent land transportation becomes less adequate, and water communication more necessary; and in a country of the extent of the United States, there is much of the most useful and necessary commerce which land transportation cannot effect at all. Plaster may be considered as the soil itself, or rather as the seed on which agriculture depends; without good roads this necessary cannot be distributed, nor will it bear long transportation by land on any roads; by canals and rivers it can be distributed to every neighborhood; the same may be said of clay, lime, coal, and timber.

The extent of our territory would indeed forbid the attempt at canal navigation were not our waters as extensive as the territory; but this being the well known fact, the very circumstance which would otherwise form the chief objection is the strongest recommendation. Four hundred and fifty miles of artificial canals would be valuable where they are the only means of water communication, but would for a long time, probably, be too expensive an acquisition; but when 450 miles of canals, of the least expensive construction, offers to our acceptance 10,000 miles of additional inland navigation, the case is reversed; and the sacrifice we make is in the neglect of this great national and permanent object.

Look at every country in Europe, to say nothing of China, where the most cogent example might be found. But some will answer me, that we ought not to draw our examples from the old and despotic Governments and enslaved subjects of Europe. But why, then, do they not throw away their muskets in war, and their ploughs in peace, because these implements were introduced from Europe? I shall not dwell, however, abroad. In China we see a great country, literally filled with inhabitants; canals are its support and ornament. In Europe we have only to name the canals which abound all over it. They have always been most encouraged by the wisest Governments, under those reigns which have given the character to each nation of which it makes its boast—think of Holland, France, Germany, Russia, Prussia, and even Sweden. These improvements are associated with the names of Louis XIV., Frederick, and Peter the Great; in Great Britain, with that of a Bridgewater.

I shall detain you with particular instances from one only of the States of Europe—Great Britain—and there with but two of the number of instances which might be detailed. The first that occurs is that system of internal navigation, projected and perfected by the Duke of Bridgewater; the whole extent is only one hundred and thirty-eight miles, but so expensive and difficult have been the works, and so great the perfection attained, that it seems more than the result of human exertion. The lockage, aqueducts, culverts, feeders, and reservoirs of this navigation, are more expensive than all the canals required in the United States; but the most extraordinary part of all is the under-ground navigation of eighteen miles, which forms a part of it. This is carried upon two levels; the lower extending twelve miles through different seams of coal, the upper is one hundred and ten feet higher, extending six miles, and is from one hundred and fourteen to one hundred and eighty perpendicular feet below the surface of the ground. The communication between the upper and lower levels, an inclined plane, dipping one foot in four, near four hundred feet, cut in a solid rock of white granite, upon which the loaded boats are passed up and down upon rollers and railways, by a windlass and horse power.

This navigation connects London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Hull, performing amongst them all necessary exchanges of commodities, whether raw or manufactured, enabling these great and populous cities and towns, with all the intermediate country, to obtain, besides the ordinary exchangeable commodities, clays, quarried stone, lime, marble, sand, and even manures of all kinds, and fuel for their immense consumption. Vastly expensive as the works have been, they are found profitable to their owners, and justly considered as having added more to the general prosperity of England than any other one establishment has ever done. The second and last in Europe which I shall notice, is the Forth and Clyde navigation in Scotland. The canal which unites these waters is only thirty-eight miles long; but a work of such vast expense and difficulty, that although it had been projected by Charles the Second, and having been abandoned for the want of resources, was again revived in 1723, when a survey was made; again in 1762, 63, and 64, 67, and 68. It was never thoroughly commenced until 1768; never opened for navigation until 1774, and then but for something less than half its extent. Eleven miles still remained to be made in 1784. It was not completed the whole distance until 1790; and the whole revenues were expended in perfecting this expensive work until 1799 inclusive. In that year the company were permitted by act of Parliament to add the interest of their expenditure to their original stock, which formed an accumulated capital of £421,525, divided into 1,297 shares of £325 each, and on this sum their dividends were limited to ten per cent., and the first dividend was made in 1800, of only three and one thirteenth per cent. This navigation, although only thirty-eight miles, was constructed at an enormous expense; having its summit level at an elevation of one hundred and fifty-six feet; medium width of the surface fifty-six feet, at bottom twenty-seven, depth throughout the whole eight feet, calculated to be increased to nine; thirty-nine locks of eight feet fall each, seventy-four feet long, and twenty wide between the walls; passes over ten large aqueducts, and thirty-three smaller ones. There are thirty-three drawbridges over it, and sixty-three houses belonging to the company, two dry docks, and eight expensive reservoirs, covering in all eight hundred and twenty-eight acres, and from which the supply of water is conveyed from six to twenty miles. The whole expense, as has been stated, was £421,525, equal to $1,873,576, or $49,304 per mile.

Notwithstanding the enormity of the expense, this improvement is found not only a profitable stock to the company, but to give new importance to Scotland. The error most conspicuous in the conduct of this great work was, that it was not prosecuted with more vigor; that Government did not lend an efficient aid, so as to have had it in productive and useful operation in three or four years from its commencement. Minute details in this place would be tedious; they must therefore be omitted; yet in order to convey the clearest view of the importance of this single improvement, no better illustration can be given, than a simple but summary statement of the progress of wealth in its vicinity, and of the revenue derived from the tolls for a given period. This statement I shall attempt; the materials are derived from an authority which I believe may be implicitly relied upon. It will show that its advantages were small, have steadily and rapidly increased, that they have become great, and are still as likely to increase as heretofore. The revenues of this canal were, omitting fractions, in 1774, £678; 1784, £7,457; 1794, £12,373; 1804, £20,872; and in 1814, £48,074 sterling; equal to $213,648. The increase of population, improvement, and general prosperity of the city of Glasgow, and along the whole tract of the canal and its vicinity, has been in a ratio correspondent to that of the revenue which accrued to the canal company. Time, however, would fail to permit a reference to the statistical accounts by which this is demonstrated; these are, however, in the reach of any member of this House. The instance is, upon the whole, most striking; especially when it is considered that this is in a country which had remained stationary for centuries, with confirmed habits. If such effects are experienced in the dry tree, what may we not hope for in the green?

I come back now to our own country, the great features of which we have all contemplated; the country which, above all others, presents at once the means and the inducements for similar enterprise. Canals here have not yet had an experiment; they have been but partially attempted, without any aid or patronage from Government, an aid which, in this country, is peculiarly and indispensably necessary to their success; because those of most importance are so to the whole community rather than to any portion of it. The situations in which they are required might be enumerated, the evident advantages dwelt upon, the practicability demonstrated; but as an epitome, let a single instance be selected; one which has in a manner forced itself, almost, but scarcely altogether, into existence and usefulness. I select this one because I have offered facts to support the statement which I shall offer respecting it, and because these facts are recent: The Dismal Swamp Canal in Virginia and North Carolina. This improvement has, indeed, been long projected, and some progress made in the work, though very imperfect; it had been cut through the land which separates the waters of the Chesapeake Bay and the Albemarle Sound, and furnished with wooden locks, but not of sufficient depth or width, nor were the works kept up. It was neglected from the want of funds. So great, however, were the hardships experienced for want of a communication during the late war, that, under all the inconveniences of that period, a considerable share of attention, under the dictates of necessity, was directed to this canal, and exertions are still continued for its completion, but with considerable doubts whether the want of sufficient funds will not again force a suspension. Imperfect as it was, it was, in 1815, for about six weeks, open for navigation. In that short period, and besides the articles paying toll by valuation, the following articles are officially stated to have passed through, viz: 6,519,419 shingles; 1,160,591 staves; 16,703 bushels of Indian corn; 2,313 bushels of rice; 2,138 hogsheads of tobacco; 2,767 bbls. of fish; 3,575 barrels of tar; 329 casks of turpentine spirits; 2,475 bales of cotton; 119 barrels of black lead; 327 tons of iron; 181 tons of lead, powder, and shot. A small encouragement from Government by subscription for shares of stock or otherwise, would insure the completion, on an enlarged plan, of this valuable work, which is otherwise in danger of failure; the more especially to be regretted, because it (as well as the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal) is one of the links of the chain of inland navigation, from Boston harbor to St. Mary's river; the importance of which, as a national object, is sufficiently understood by this House and this nation. The Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company wait only the nod of this Government to be again in activity, with funds within its reach to the amount of $600,000, (100,000 of which have been actually invested in the works, upon a permanent plan,) depending wholly upon the encouragement of subscription for stock by this Government, to the amount of only about one quarter of that sum. In Jersey, also, individual enterprise is in preparation, anxiously waiting only the encouraging intimation from this Government. New York is in similar readiness upon a larger scale. So, also, is Pennsylvania, and I believe every State in the Union. But each must be discouraged, for the want of any assurance that correspondent improvements in neighboring States will be effected, upon which the value of its own must greatly depend, and above all by the circumstance that the National Government possess exclusively the funds adequate to insure success to undertakings of so much magnitude, and the paramount interest in their completion; as their obvious tendency is to enrich the revenues of commerce, to enhance the national lands, and afford the cheapest and most efficient defence of the country.

The facts which have been stated, the experience of a recent war, the interests of peace, the favoring aspect of the world at peace, and the state of our own resources, all recommend the great objects of improvement to this Government, and especially at this time. In settling a peace system, these should form a prominent part of it. Other considerations press the subject upon us at this period. Who can say what foreign commerce has to offer us after the present year? Let us, then, secure one at home, and navigate through our own peaceful territories, when we have no object to invite us across the ocean. Nor ought we, in the security of peace, to forget that we have lately been at war. Circumstances are not wanting at this moment to admonish us that the world is not to be trusted. The temper of Spain, of Great Britain, and of some Indian tribes, are far from being in harmony with us on some points of considerable importance. One circumstance of great importance was noticed by a gentleman from New York yesterday, (Mr. GOLD)—the rivalry of an adjoining province of Great Britain in the trade and commerce of our possessions. The waters of the St. Lawrence at present afford the only channel of export to more than half the territories of Vermont and New York, to a portion of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, all the Michigan territory. Part of this extensive district is already populous, and the rest becoming so with rapidity. Smuggled merchandise may defraud our revenue, and rival our manufactures in that quarter, and its produce of all kinds must be drawn to the British ports in Canada by the easy descent of the waters. By the same channel an intercourse is easily kept up between the British Government and traders, and all the Northwestern Indians, so as to secure their trade, and cherish unfriendly dispositions towards us. The whole of the trade and commerce of all that extensive region, as well of the present and future white population, as with the Indians, may be advantageously turned and secured to the United States, only by improved inland navigation and roads. When it is considered that both those of the Lakes and St. Lawrence afford a greater abundance of lumber than any river in the United States—that large importations through Canada are alone wanting to furnish transports for large supplies of that lumber—I, for one, am not disposed totally to disregard the possible rivalry of British enterprise in that quarter, especially when it is a commercial enterprise, connected with her shipping interests, even with her navy. We possess the ample means of securing to ourselves that part of our northern trade which belongs to us; and I would rather resort to those means in due time, than afterwards to regret their neglect. Let us never forget that Great Britain taught us the experiment of building a 100 gun ship on Lake Ontario, when not a man in the Government could be prevailed upon to believe it. When it could no longer be doubted, then it could never get out of Kingston harbor; and when this was effected, then such a ship would be too unwieldy for the lake; could not be sea-worthy if built in less than two years. But she did sail, and, if not calculated to endure forty years, she might sail very well for Ontario, which was all that was required. Let us take care that she does not catch us slumbering in too confident a reliance on her stupidity in peace, as we did in war. Let us bear in mind the duty on timber, and the Nova Scotia plaster bill, with some other hints. Let not timely admonitions always be as dreams, but considered on their merits. I beg pardon of the House for having trespassed so far beyond my intention. I hope this bill will pass into a law. It provides in part for a system expedient, necessary, suited to this country, and to this time. Of this I hope few will doubt—this, none can disprove by fact or argument. Some, indeed, consider it a violation of the Constitution; I consider a failure to adopt it a more serious violation.

Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, said he would occupy the time, perhaps the attention of the House, but a very few minutes; nor should he have risen, if the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Maryland (Messrs. KING and WRIGHT) had not made uncommon exertions to impress the public, if not the House, with a belief that a vote in favor of the bill under consideration, would be oppressive and injurious to the distressed and laboring poor, who at this moment, it is said, are scarcely able to procure bread for themselves and families. He said he felt, he trusted, as much as any member for the distresses of that useful class of citizens; and would be willing to join in any proper measure, calculated to alleviate their sufferings; but how, or in what way, the rejection of this bill will relieve the poor, or give bread to the needy, he was totally unable to discern. He had heard of no proposition to distribute the bonus and dividends of the bank among the necessitous, nor would they become due in time to relieve the present distress. The internal taxes are not paid by those who labor, and who possess no property. The imposts and duties on the importations of foreign goods, bear hard upon them; they pay a heavy and disproportionate tax for their clothing, their salt, their sugar, and their coffee. But no proposition has been made to reduce the imposts and duties on those articles; on the contrary, the House has been pressed to increase the tax on clothing. If the bill shall pass into a law, it will not injure the poor, but may benefit them, by giving labor to hundreds, perhaps thousands, who are now out of employment; and the gentlemen who profess such generous feelings in favor of the poor and distressed laborer, may find consolation in the reflection that, in every district of the United States, individual, township, county, or State, wealth will be found equal to the relief of their respective poor, without the interference of the General Government.

The questions, said Mr. R., submitted to the House by the bill and proposed amendments, are perhaps of as great importance as any that ever occupied the attention of the National Legislature. They involve, in their consideration, inquiries of vast moment to the peace and prosperity of the community—such as, where do State rights end? and where do those of the General Government begin? in regulating and promoting the internal improvement and commerce of the country—in the laying out and making of roads; in the cutting of canals; in the clearing of rivers and water-courses, and declaring them public highways. Would not the exercise of such powers, by Congress, without the consent of the States, be found in practice to interfere with State rights? And would not a failure of Congress to exercise those powers, in some instances which might occur, be destructive of the equal rights of the States? The Constitutional question has been abstractedly discussed with considerable ability, but the practical operation of the exercise of such powers, or a refusal to exercise such powers, has not been examined, and therefore, said Mr. R., my mind is not at rest; it vibrates between conflicting opinions and conclusions. On the one side, it might be asked, have Congress the power to clear rivers, prostrate dams, and remove obstructions, erected by the authority of the State? Can Congress make any water-course or public highway, or appropriate it to public use, against the will of the State within whose territory it lies? Could Congress compel the State of Pennsylvania to suffer, unmolested, and without tax or toll, the produce and lumber of the State of New York to pass down the Susquehanna, through Pennsylvania, into Maryland? On the other side, it might be asked, if the State of New York should pass a law prohibiting the vessels of any other State than her own, sailing up the North river to Albany; or the State of Virginia should prohibit by law the vessels of the other States from navigating her rivers; or should the States of Virginia and Ohio prohibit the vessels of the State of Pennsylvania descending the river Ohio to the market of New Orleans, or exact a toll for permission to pass, could Congress constitutionally interfere, and restore the States to the free and uninterrupted right of navigating those rivers? If the answer should be in the affirmative, the next question would be, by what authority? The answer must be, the Constitution has vested in Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States, and such acts would be calculated to embarrass, impede, or prevent a fair and equal commerce among them.

View the practical operation of the bill and the proposed amendments, and they present doubts and difficulties on every side, which, however, Congress may be obliged at no very distant period to decide; but at present they may be obviated by acting with the consent of the States; and therefore, said Mr. R., I shall vote against the indefinite postponement, in the hope that it may be so modified as to avoid all Constitutional objections to its passage.

It is alleged, that everything that is contemplated by this bill, may be accomplished by an agreement between the States to give that direction and extension to roads and canals, necessary to their completion—and therefore it is unnecessary and inexpedient for Congress to pass any law on the subject. But gentlemen should recollect that the Constitution has expressly said that no Stateshall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State. The prohibition is general—it is well it is so—otherwise, two or three States might combine to give the commerce of those States a direction so as to promote their combined interests, but ruinous to all the others, and destructive of the best interest of the country. None but great national objects, calculated to promote the good of the whole, and such as could not be accomplished by the means or within the limits of any particular State, should receive the aid of the General Government.

Another objection has been made to acting at all on the subject at this time, because the country has just emerged from an expensive war; is involved in debt; her revenue not more than equal to the fulfilment of her present engagements, and impossible to retrench any of the existing expenditures, except about fifty thousand dollars in the pay of the brevet officers. But, said Mr. R., I would ask the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) if it is any more necessary now than during the Revolutionary war that the officers of the Army should be allowed pay for servants? Are there not 680 servants of officers, each receiving 168 dollars per annum? May they not be dispensed with? Will it not save to the country $111,000? May not the Commissioners of the Loan Offices be discharged, and their duties transferred to the National Bank and its branches? And will not it produce a saving of nearly the same amount? May not a retrenchment be made in the Hospital department, and many others? These are questions, said Mr. R., I profess to know very little about; but if I were in the situation of the gentleman from Maryland, and some others, I believe I should be able to suggest many cases in which the Government might retrench the expenditures to a very considerable amount, without any injury, but with great advantage to the community. Mr. R. said he had suggested those inquiries, and given those hints, as in his humble opinion worthy of consideration, and not as arguments for or against the passage of the bill. He must repeat his decided opposition to the motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill, because he thought the object in view of sufficient magnitude to merit the attention of the House. It may finally assume an unexceptionable form, and deserve and receive the approbation of this House and the nation.

Mr. KING again rose. I regret, said he, to ask again for a moment your indulgence upon this subject. The honorable gentlemen from South Carolina and Pennsylvania (Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. ROSS) suppose that the distresses which I have stated to exist at this time in many parts of our country are confined to the vicinity of the few towns which I named yesterday. For the good of my country I wish it were so; though within that limit they would claim my utmost sympathy. But look at other portions of your country; at that magnificent city, the great emporium of commerce—New York. Count the bankruptcies which there daily take place. The paper received from that city this day contains nearly two hundred recent cases, and many thousand now exist in that State. You find almost the same scene of distress and bankruptcy in every commercial city. Is this a time, then, to squander millions, when thousands of our citizens are destitute of bread—involvement in misery and ruin? The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks, how will it benefit the people if we should not pass this bill? I will tell him. It will enable us to take off some of the internal taxes; to ease the people, at least, of taxes to the annual amount of $800,000. I will name to him too, sir, one tax which ought to be immediately repealed. I mean that on retailers. Whatever is laid on them is felt by their customers, and the poor are daily obliged to resort to them for support. But, sir, I have not named to you all the poor of the land. Within this favored District—this magnificent ten miles square—are thousands poor and distressed. We meet with them in every part of it; nay, the very doors and entry of this hall are besieged by them—for though we fare sumptuously every day, there are thousands around us pining in misery and want.

And what are the real objects for which the people and their money are to be sacrificed? We have heard this day, sir—the grand canal from Lake Ontario to the Hudson; to build up the already overgrown State of New York. And what direct interest have the citizens of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, and other remote States, in building up that great and powerful State? Or why will the Representatives of those States tax their constituents for that object? Or for the one, sir, which you mentioned yesterday, of constructing locks and canals round the falls of the Ohio? These are the objects which are to swallow up the most of this appropriation. What you say of a great post road, is a mere tub to the whale. The post roads in New England are now good. If they are not so elsewhere, let those concerned make them so. But the object which appears to dazzle honorable gentlemen most, the military part especially, are the splendid military roads which are contemplated. Well, suppose them made, and all the armories, and arsenals, and military academies, which gentlemen can desire, and the nation stands in complete armor. What next? War! war! is the next cry which will resound within these walls. We have enough ready to "cry havoc, and let slip the dogs of war!" Then—then—we shall enjoy the sublime spectacle of seeing our citizens chained to the chariots of the victor, with his garments rolled in blood!

Is it possible, sir, under all these circumstances, that Congress can appropriate a million and a half of dollars, and the accruing dividends for twenty years, on eleven millions of dollars owned by the United States in the National Bank, for the objects contemplated in this bill? And what are these objects? Some gentlemen talk of a great national post road to be made at the expense of the United States, from Orleans to Moose Island—I ask pardon, sir; Moose Island, at present, belongs to the British—Lubec, I should have said;—others propose noble military roads, in various parts of the country, to facilitate the march of numerous armies, which they wish to be on foot, not recollecting that they will be equally convenient for an invading army: many desire to have constructed with this money grand and extensive canals, connecting the waters of the Lakes with them, which in our country fall into the Atlantic. Is it for these chimerical objects that the people of this country are to be oppressed and burdened with taxes? Are these the purposes for which they formed the Constitution of the United States? No, it cannot be! Sir, the Constitutional question I shall not discuss; it is a sufficient objection to the bill for me, that it is unnecessary, inexpedient, and oppressive. I am not pleased with the manner in which the Constitution of this country has been treated on this and other occasions in this House. One honorable gentleman supposes he could make the provisions of this bill comport with the Constitution, if he could change only a semicolon into a comma. Another, less conscientious, would wish to change a word; and a fourth, more bold, a whole sentence; in which way they could make it mean anything or nothing, as its enemies now pretend it does. We have heard, on a former occasion, a gentleman gravely inform the House, that the true federative principle—the vital spirit of the Constitution, was gone. Another honorable gentleman agreed with him in opinion, and appeared well disposed to follow its course, as he called it, to its long home. Sir, I solemnly caution gentlemen how they speak thus lightly, thus irreverently of this sacred charter. Yes, sir, sacred charter, notwithstanding the contempt with which some treat it. Let them remember that, from talking against it, the transition is but small to acting against it. When the people shall adopt such sentiments, and lose their reverence and attachment to the Constitution, we may tremble at the consequence. But I believe there is a redeeming, a renovating principle in this country, which shall set at defiance the assaults of the enemies of the Constitution; that redeeming spirit is in the great body of the American people. We have lately felt it. I trust we shall always feel it. And that it will perpetuate the Constitution, and the Republican institutions of our country.

Mr. HARRISON advocated the bill, and Mr. HARDIN spoke in opposition.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

About 4 o'clock, the debate not having closed, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

FRIDAY, February 7.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Park Holland, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of Park Holland, which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. YANCEY also made a report on the petition of George Buckmaster, which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of George Buckmaster, which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.

Mr. YANCEY, from the same committee, also made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Archibald Mollvain and of Paul Robinson. The former report was agreed to; the latter, after a good deal of discussion on the merits of the case, was amended, on motion of Mr. LYON, so as to declare that the petition ought to be granted, and then committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to increase the compensation of certain collectors of the customs; also a bill making additional appropriations to defray the expense of the army and militia during the late war; also a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1817; which bills were twice read and severally committed.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been recommitted the bill authorizing the appointment of circuit judges, reported a bill for the better administration of justice in the Supreme Court, and for the appointment of circuit judges; which was read and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Military Committee, reported a bill for the relief of certain officers of the staff of Governor Edwards, of the Illinois Territory; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate for the more prompt settlement of public accounts, with sundry amendments; which were read, and, with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, detailing their operations subsequent to their report of the 7th of February, 1816, so far as the same have been completed; which were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HAHN, the Secretary of War was instructed to report to this House the reasons why the militia fines incurred by delinquents, under the late call of the militia into the service of the United States, are not finally collected.

A Message was received yesterday from the President of the United States, recommending to Congress that provision be made by law for payments to the State of Georgia, equal to the amount of Mississippi stock which shall be paid into the Treasury, until the stipulated sum of $1,250,000 shall be completed, &c.; which was referred to Messrs. HALL, THOMAS, WILDE, WILLIAMS, and ATHERTON.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Lewis Olmsted from imprisonment," was read twice and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the division of certain quarter sections in future sales of public lands," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act concerning the Naval Establishment,'" was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill to set apart and pledge, as a fund for internal improvement, the bonus and United States share of the dividends of the National Bank—Mr. KING's motion to postpone the bill indefinitely being still under consideration.

[In the progress of the bill various amendments were proposed to the first section, and some of them adopted; when Mr. PICKERING moved to strike out the whole of the first section, after the enacting words, and offered a substitute, which was finally adopted. This expressed the objects for which the funds arising from the United States interest in the National Bank should be pledged, to be, "for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for their common defence." And that the several States might equally share in the advantages to be derived from such an appropriation of those funds, it was further proposed that they should be applied in each State, in the ratio of its representation in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature, for the purposes aforesaid, and in such manner as Congress, with the assent of such State, should by law direct.

In supporting these amendments, and obviating objections, Mr. PICKERING spoke several times in the course of the discussion; and the following is a summary of his observations.]

A gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) had said the bill, as amended, was deceptive. If, said Mr. PICKERING, plainly to describe the funds to be applied in this case, and explicitly to state the objects on which they should be expended, were deceptive, then the gentleman's charge was just.

The parts of the Constitution to which Mr. P. had more than once had occasion to refer, as the grounds on which his support of the bill rested, were those which gave to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States," and "to provide for the common defence." The regulation of commerce with foreign nations, comprehends all the measures requisite to secure to the United States their due share in its benefits; to divert its streams, arising from their own productions, from foreign channels, and to turn them into their own, for the profit of the citizens of the United States. This advantage would be immense, in relation to the vast and rapidly increasing products of the States bordering on the Lakes and their water communications; which products, without good roads and canals, will descend the St. Lawrence, instead of proceeding to the Atlantic States.

As incidents to the commerce with foreign nations, and so far as it takes place by sea, among the several States, in the coasting trade, light-houses, beacons, and piers, have been erected, because necessary for the security of that commerce. But this necessity is of the moral kind—highly useful—the means of preserving property and lives, and not absolute, or one without which that commerce could not exist: for we know, said he, that American commerce, coeval with the settlement of the country, was long carried on without light-houses, beacons, or piers; and even so late as the commencement of our Revolution, not more than four or five light-houses are recollected to have been erected. Their multiplication, and the construction of public piers, are the work of the Government under the present Constitution; and was it ever said or thought by any one that these acts of our Government, from the beginning of WASHINGTON'S Administration to this day, were violations of the Constitution? It has, indeed, been said that the last clause but one, in the eighth section of the first article, expressly mentions "the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings;" but, whoever will examine that clause, will perceive that it does not give Congress any power to erect those works, but simply to exercise exclusive legislation over the places where they are erected; such place having been previously purchased with the consent of the States in which the same shall be. The power to erect such works and buildings is no where expressed in the Constitution. It is then an implied power, whose existence is recognised by the Constitution itself. But, where can it be found, unless it be involved in the express powers to regulate commerce, and to provide for the common defence? Without navigation, without commerce, by sea, we should need no light-houses, beacons, or piers.

If, then, it was Constitutional to erect the works which have been mentioned, to give facility, safety, and expedition to commerce by sea, will any one deny the Constitutional power of Congress to erect similar works on our interior waters—on the great Lakes? A proposition is now on our tables to erect a light-house at Presque Isle, on Lake Erie, for the same useful purpose as the light-houses erected on the seacoast. But what entitles the citizens on the borders of the Lakes to peculiar and exclusive advantages in transporting their products to market? Common water transportation is cheap, and it is more so when, by means of light-houses, beacons, and piers, it is expedited, and rendered more safe. And every one knows how much cheaper and safer, and more expeditious, is land transportation over good roads than over bad ones. Why then should the inland inhabitants be denied advantages which none hesitate to grant to the borderers on the great waters? Commerce is the exchange of commodities, and is necessary to be carried on by land, as well as by water; and where canals shall be added to good roads, the facilities and cheapness of interior commerce among the several States will be proportionably increased.

For the common defence, troops and all the munitions of war are provided. Good roads and canals would at all times render their movements and transportation more cheap, expeditious, and safe. In time of war, these accommodations would be of the utmost moment. It has been admitted that at that time it would be constitutionally right to make good roads for the passage of troops and the transportation of artillery, stores and provisions; because most materially contributing to the necessary means of defence. Is it not then equally right and proper to anticipate the utility and necessity of such works as good roads and canals, in time of peace, when alone it is practicable to make them?

Another benefit to result from good roads may be mentioned, though not so important as the last; that is, the greater safety and expedition with which the mail would be carried on the great lines of communication through all the States.

It has been objected that the distribution of the avails of the proposed fund among the several States, to be applied in constructing roads and canals, in such manner as Congress with the assent of the several States shall direct, would give rise to long and injurious contests. But if, instead of the proposed application of the fund, the whole were left at the sole disposition of Congress, similar contests must arise; from the diversity of opinions and interests among members, which will never fail to exist. That any State will withhold its assent, and thus lose the immense advantages of such improved channels of communication, is to the last degree improbable. Such only, it is to be presumed, will be projected by Congress, as, while they benefit the whole Union, will be peculiarly advantageous to the individual States through which they shall run. When Mr. P. had concluded—

The debate was continued on the expediency and constitutionality of the bill; in which Messrs. SHEFFEY, CALHOUN, THOS. WILSON, and YATES, spoke in support, and Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. KING, in opposition to the bill. Mr. ROSS also, without at present fully advocating the bill, spoke against its indefinite postponement.

Mr. WRIGHT addressed the Chair as follows:

Sir: I hope this House will take a view of the present situation of the American people, from their short crops, and the present state of their taxes, from two glorious wars, before they subscribe to the application of the moneys arising to the United States from the National Bank, just now established, amounting, for the bonus, to one million and a half of dollars, to be paid in three equal annual payments, and to their share of the interest arising to the nation, estimated at the sum of six hundred thousand dollars per year, for twenty years, and that, too, for a distant object—the making roads and canals. And, sir, although I shall readily admit the great advantage that will be derived from roads and canals, to the United States, in facilitating the transportation of the productions, the property and persons of the agriculturist, the merchant, and the manufacturer, yet I cannot, at this time, consent to pledge the faith of this nation to the application of this bonus, and the interest arising for twenty years from this bank, when I know that it must lead this House to the further violation of their faith, pledged to the American people in the numerous tax bills passed during the war, and to secure its prosecution; by which it was expressly enacted, “that the taxes should continue for and during the war, and to the end of one year thereafter, and no longer.” Thus, sir, we pledged our constituents to the Government, that these taxes should continue for and during the war, and to the end of one year thereafter; and in the same acts we pledged ourselves, as a Congress, to our constituents, that those taxes should continue no longer than to the end of one year after the termination of the war. This double pledge to the Government and to the people, had the double object of securing the confidence of the Government in the necessary permanence of the taxes for the prosecution of the war to its conclusion, and, by its continuance one year thereafter, to cover all contingent expenses, and of assuring the people that these taxes should continue no longer than to the end of one year after the termination of the war. You will all do me the justice to admit my zeal for the fulfilment of this pledge to the people at the last session, and the ardent manner that I have pressed it upon this House, “that an individual thus pledging himself, and thus violating his faith, would stand a living monument of his own disgrace;” and that I could not discriminate between an individual and this House. Sir, if this House could shield itself from the violation of its faith by the honest necessity of the case, it could no longer use that shield than that necessity existed. And will any man say that this bonus, and that the interest of this bank could not as well be applied to the relieving of the people from so much of their taxes as would be paid by the application of this bonus and the interest of this bank, arising to the United States, contemplated, by this bill, to be applied to the roads and canals, and thus far heal the violated faith of this House to the American people? Sir, the violation of the faith of the nation to the people, by not relieving them as soon as possible from these taxes, will inflict a wound on the honor of the National Legislature that will not easily be healed, and may lead, by the precedent it sets, to the repeal of the very law now contemplated to be passed, to transfer the nation’s right to the bonus, and its share of the interest arising from the National Bank. Besides, sir, would it be decent for this Congress to dispose of the bonus, none of which is payable in their time, and of the interest of this bank for twenty years to come, when the people have given them a broad hint that they had lost their confidence, it being conjectured that not more than one-fourth of this Congress will have a seat in the next? Indeed, sir, it appears to me as the Legislative political last will and testament of the House upon their death bed, laboring under a paroxysm of the disease that brought them to their end. For you may rest assured, sir, that nothing so injured the political standing of this House with the American people, as their refusing to redeem the pledge they had given, that the taxes should continue “no longer” than to the end of one year after the termination of the war.

H. OF R.

Sir, I have been frequently hailed by my constituents as the guardian of their rights, for my conduct in this respect, and my solicitude to relieve them from their taxes at the close of an expensive, though a short and glorious war, agreeably to this pledge. This act will be so considered by the people, and our successors will not be pleased with our undertaking to dispose of the bonus and the interest of the bank for twenty years, no part of which will be applicable to any legislative purpose during the time of the Fourteenth Congress. Sir, I have thus shown you my impressions of the inexpediency of the application of this fund to these objects, at this time, when it must further protract the relief from the taxes, which in good faith ought to have been discontinued at the end of one year after the war. But, sir, I am opposed to this House’s application of this sum to such purposes, as I conceive they are not authorized by the Constitution to apply them—they have no right to cut roads; this is left with the States. But if the money proposed to be applied to those objects, could be conveniently spared, and without violating the faith of the nation, or violating the Constitution, I should be opposed to this bill, by which, Congress shall have the power to apply such a sum to roads and canals, at their will and pleasure. We know the small States have little influence on this floor, and I am sure the State that honors me with a seat here will get but little benefit from it; but sir, if the bill secured us in a just distributive share, I ask, would it be just that the old States, who have on their own account expended countless millions on their public roads, and already have all they want, should now be taxed to cut roads in the new States, who have scarcely any roads? Can it be right thus to apply a common fund, when the new States only will be benefitted by it? Besides, in the new States, road funds have already been supplied, by the application of a certain portion of the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the said States. But we are told of the benefit to Maryland, from the cross-cut canal between the Delaware and Chesapeake bays—but suppose Maryland had her share of this fund applied to that object, it would yield for the bonus twenty-five thousand dollars a year for three years and the sum of thirty thousand dollars per year for twenty years, and to Delaware two-ninths of that sum. Sir, this would be such a pittance in the completion of so all-important a work, and so slow in its products, that it would have a deleterious if not a paralytic effect upon this great object, and never can be respected as promoting it. But we cannot suffer ourselves to be deceived by those suggestions, while we recollect the case of that canal, and conduct of this House upon the occasion—a case that came before us under the most imposing circumstances. A private company had commenced the canal, and from a confidence in its practicability, and vast utility, had proceeded to demarcate the route, and had purchased the property, and had made considerable progress in the work; but finding the expense would exceed the means, the private adventurers that had embarked in it, from its great consequence to the agricultural and commercial interest, and its consequent profit to the stockholders, applied to the Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, who all subscribed liberally for the stock, but, from a deficiency still, they applied to Congress also to take a certain portion of the stock so as to enable them to complete the work, and a bill passed the Senate for that purpose, where Maryland and Delaware were equally represented, but it was defeated in this House by the opposition of a gentleman from the then largest State, who spoke with a score of tongues; which vote, had the yeas and nays been taken, would have shown how little respect was paid to the advice of our WASHINGTON, against geographical distinctions, there being scarcely a vote for it to the southward and westward of the Potomac. And, sir, I regret that our legislative proceedings do not wear a better aspect, but rather a more Southern and Western ascension, and a more Northern and Eastern declension. Sir, we have been told by the highest authority, that our Constitution was a measure of compromise, and every day's experience proves that our legislation is in the spirit of that instrument, and the legislative acts the legitimate branches of that stock. Sir, the amount of the sum to the respective States, if distributed in the ratio of their representation, would be but a bagatelle to effect the important object of canals, and could not be felt in their completion. Sir, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, which is so important to the United States, and in the centre of the Union, and had been so far progressed in, I had fondly hoped, would at this session of Congress have received the fostering hand of Government; but this bill has defeated that hope, and placed this canal far in the back ground. And, sir, although Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, by the Constitutional compromise, have given up so much to the Union, by the impost and tonnage arising in their ports, yielding so great a portion of the revenue to the United States; and although they are so deeply interested in this canal, which has been so liberally patronized by the citizens of these States, and by their respective Legislatures—and although the citizens of these States will pay so great a portion of the bonus, being so largely stockholders, and so great a portion of the interest of this bank by their extensive commercial use of it—yet the funds of this bank are to be dilapidated on roads, which they already have; that I fear as to that important object to the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, notwithstanding their liberal contribution to its stock, and their solicitude from its utility, that their hopes for its completion will be lost in expectation and buried in disappointment.

The question was (about 4 o'clock) taken on postponing the bill indefinitely—tantamount to a rejection—and decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 86, as follows:

The question then recurred on Mr. CALHOUN'S motion to amend Mr. PICKERING'S amendment, by striking therefrom the words "with the consent of the State," and lost by a large majority.

Mr. PICKERING'S amendment was then agreed to without a division.

Mr. KILBOURN moved further to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That when it shall be the wish of any State that a part of its share in the funds set apart and appropriated by this act, shall be applied to the purposes intended by this act within the limits of any other State or States, and shall manifest the same to Congress by a resolution of the Legislature thereof, it may and shall be lawful for Congress to provide for and direct the application of such sum, in such manner as they shall think proper, to the specific purposes set forth in such resolution, and none other.

This motion was objected to by Mr. CALHOUN, only because he believed the bill already contained, by a fair construction, the power proposed by the amendment.

The motion was negatived without a division, and after having previously rejected several motions to adjourn, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 8.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to which was referred the petition of Henry Lee, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. N. reported a bill for the relief of the said Henry Lee; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause payment to be made of certain alien duties; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to remit certain duties.

On motion of Mr. CHAPPELL, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, were instructed to inquire into the propriety of altering the present mode of paying invalid pensions, so far as it regards those pensions which have not been demanded within a reasonable time.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of State to publish the laws of the United States, in any number of papers he may deem proper, not exceeding six in each State.

On motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the law passed on the 15th day of December, 1814, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit, by duties on carriages and the harness used therefor," so as to provide for the annual valuation of carriages liable to the duty or tax imposed by the said law.

Mr. ATHERTON submitted the following resolution, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the following be adopted as an addition to the standing rules of the House:

It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Expenditures to examine whether any offices, under the laws of the United States, have become useless or unnecessary, and to report from time to time on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all officers under the laws of the United States, and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. DICKENS:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to repeal so much of the acts now in force as lay a duty on salt.

The question was taken, Will the House now consider this resolution? and it was determined in the negative.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act directing the discharge of Oliver Olmsted from imprisonment," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Park Holland," was read the third time and passed.

PETITION OF NOAH MILLER.

Mr. PARRIS, from the committee appointed on the petition of Noah Miller, made a report, which was read; when Mr. P. reported a bill for the relief of the said Noah Miller, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That, on the 19th of April, 1815, the petitioner was inspector of the port of Penobscot, in the State of Massachusetts; that, on the said 19th of April, in the execution of the duties of his said office, the petitioner seized a quantity of beef belonging to one Daniel Whittier, who was in the act of conveying the same in a boat to Castine, then invested by a British fleet and army in hostility to the United States; and that, in consequence of such seizure, the petitioner received from said Whittier a severe wound in his right hand by a large knife, aimed at his body, by reason of which wound the petitioner has lost the use of said hand; that Whittier has been convicted of the offence before the supreme judicial court of the State of Massachusetts, and punished by imprisonment; but in consequence of his poverty was, by order of court, discharged from prison, in which, after the expiration of the term for which he was sentenced, he had been detained several months for the payment of the costs of prosecution.

The evidence adduced to the committee proves that the petitioner discharged the duties of the office of inspector at a time of great hazard, when it was difficult to obtain any other person to enter upon them; that he was faithful and persevering, even at the risk of his personal safety; and in consequence of his activity, as appears by a certificate from the collector, the smuggling of provisions to the relief of the enemy at Castine was interrupted.

The committee, believing that those persons who are unfortunately disabled in enforcing the revenue laws are entitled to relief equally with those who are disabled in the military service, and that sound policy requires that every reasonable inducement should be offered to insure a faithful execution of those laws, have reported a bill for the relief of the petitioner.

REPORT ON ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. THOMAS WILSON, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the subject of roads and canals, made a detailed report; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred, on the 4th of December last, so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to roads and canals, report, in part:

That, upon mature deliberation, the facility of commercial and personal intercourse throughout the whole extent of the United States and its Territories is viewed by the committee, as it appears to have been viewed by former committees of both branches of the National Legislature, and by every Executive of the Government since its formation, as an essential ingredient in the general economy of the nation, as well in relation to the pursuits of peace as to those of war, and also to the perpetuation and integrity of the Republican Union.

That the interior waters of the United States, co-extensive with its territory, furnish the ample and the only effectual means of such facility. Without inland navigation an interior commerce, in a large portion of the most necessary articles, would be not merely convenient, but wholly impracticable, between sections remote from each other. Those which were destitute must remain so; and where there was abundance it would be of little value. In such a state, of all the rich bounties of nature distributed over our expanded country, ever varying in their nature and uses with our varied soils, climates, and pursuits, a scanty portion only could be appropriated to the subsistence and comfort of civilized man. Invaluable, then, are those interior waters which, even in their natural state, afford a facility of transportation of the necessities of life which no other known means could effect. But, although these waters are thus essentially requisite and extensively useful in their original state, their usefulness would be infinitely increased by improving and uniting their channels.

The great topographical features of our country are its great extent of territory, and variety of soil, climate, and production, which demonstrate the necessity on the one hand, and the number, positions, and magnitude of its bays, lakes, and rivers, which happily, on the other hand, demonstrate the practicability of an internal navigation throughout all its parts.

So magnificent and admirably arranged are these waters, that two great channels are nearly completed by nature the whole way between the extremes of the Union—the one passing through its centre three thousand miles, the other, on its margin, two thousand miles. Large and numerous rivers, communicating with each other from a common intermediate source, form natural canals from the one to the other, interrupted only by the main ridge of mountains from which they descend in opposite directions, and over which artificial roads of the best construction are known to be practicable, so as to unite with the opposite navigations within distances varying from fifty to one hundred miles. Thus the great chain called the Appalachian mountains, which once was considered as an impassable barrier and partition between the eastern and western interests, may in effect be removed; or, rather, it may be made effectually to assist that intercourse which it has seemed permanently to interrupt. The large and numerous rivers and lakes communicating with the great central channel on the North and West, together with those already noticed, which cut opposite sides of the mountains, traverse the whole continent, conducting all its waters, as they seem destined in future to convey its innumerable productions into two great channels which unite with the navigable waters of the Atlantic ocean at their two extremes, and one of them at numerous intermediate points, forming in the whole more than ten thousand miles of inland navigation, the free use of which requires only the purchase at a moderate price in labor.

The importance of this object to the United States as a community is so evident, that to ascertain its practicability, would seem sufficiently to recommend it to the attention of the National Government. The best evidence of its practicability is that already adduced—the positions and magnitude of the interior waters. These are circumstances of notorious importance, the evidence of which cannot be questioned; but it may be proper, in corroboration, also to notice that resulting from an official document of high authority.

It will be recollected that, in April, 1808, an elaborate report, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the preceding year, was made by the then Secretary of the Treasury, in which were embraced all the outlines, together with much detail of a general system of national improvement. The sum of $20,000,000 was deemed sufficient to effect the works necessary to confer on the people of every section of the United States all the advantages of good roads and canals, of which the country is susceptible. The annual application of $2,000,000 would effect this great object in ten years, and which (it was added) could be conveniently supplied from the existing revenues of the United States, leaving a sufficient surplus, in addition to the sum required for the permanent Peace Establishment and national debt, in the same period of ten years, to arm every man in the United States, to erect as many fortifications and batteries as could be manned, and, if thought eligible, to build a navy. The subject was treated in that report as one of primary national importance, conducive to the general welfare, in enhancing the value of lands, promoting useful commerce, binding the Union together by a community of interests, and constituting an important branch of the public defence. This official report of 1808 attracted much attention, and the subject-matter of it has appeared to receive the decided approbation of the citizens of the United States ever since. The execution of this plan would probably have been commenced long before this time, had not extraordinary difficulties in our foreign relations, and consequent war with Great Britain, intervened. Since the termination of the war, the necessary attention of the Government to other objects sufficiently accounts for the continued suspension of the plan of improvement recommended at that time. But these causes of suspension having now ceased, it may reasonably be expected again to attract a due share of the public attention.

A state of tranquillity has been happily restored under circumstances favoring its continuance for many years. The pursuits of peace in the United States have been resumed with renovated vigor. Great political changes in Europe have affected, and may continue materially to affect, our foreign commerce. The experience of the late war has served to develop the importance of internal transportation; and the resources of the United States are undoubtedly more ample than they were in 1808. At that time the average annual revenue was about $14,000,000. At this time, from various causes, it is increased to an average of $25,000,000. These circumstances seem peculiarly to recommend at this time such a system of general improvement as would accelerate the advancement and secure permanently the internal commerce of the United States. Two important considerations particularly recommend the subject of internal navigation to the early attention of Government—the rivalry of a foreign State in the trade and commerce of our interior possessions, and the lively interest evinced in various parts of the United States in the improvement of our facilities of intercourse.

That portion of our territory bordering upon Lake Champlain, the St. Lawrence, and great lakes, and to which these waters are the natural outlets, is moderately estimated at sixty millions of acres. Much of this is already populous, and the remainder is becoming so with surprising rapidity. Until other routes shall be greatly improved, all the productions of this extensive district must be drawn to the British ports of Lower Canada, from whence, also, the merchandise, the arms, and the influence of Great Britain are conveyed with unrivalled celerity to the recesses of all the northwestern Indian tribes within our limits. Such an intercourse can scarcely fail to engender in those numerous hordes unfriendly dispositions towards the citizens and Government of the United States in time of peace, and, in war, to array them against us in a force formidable in a degree beyond that of their specific number and strength. The whole commerce of that extensive region, as well of the present and future white population as the trade of the Indian tribes, can be advantageously turned to the posts and possessions of the United States only by an improved inland navigation.

The solicitude on the subject of internal improvements generally, which is felt in various parts of the United States at this time, is indicated in a manner not to be mistaken, and promises an effective co-operation with the National Government in any measure which it may approve and adopt for promoting them.

The perseverance of the citizens and State of New York in their efforts to ascertain the most eligible route and means for opening a navigable canal from the tide water in the North or Hudson river to Lake Erie is a pledge that their wealth and enterprise would contribute largely towards that great object. The local enterprise which has long since organized itself in companies, under State authorities, formed their plans, and progressed considerably in the execution of canals through the necks of land, respectively, which alone obstruct the inland navigation from Boston to St. Mary's, is again directed to these objects. In addition to these several works, there is wanting only a short canal from Lake Erie to some of the navigable waters which empty into the Ohio, some inconsiderable improvements in the bed of such waters, and a lockage or other improvements at the falls of Louisville, to complete the two great channels already mentioned. In all these works, although the nation has a paramount interest in their completion, there are good reasons to believe that individual or local enterprise would contribute a full half or more of the expense.

There are equal or still stronger reasons to believe that individual and local enterprise would, with alacrity, share equally at least with the United States in improving the navigation of such correspondent Atlantic and Western rivers as are best adapted for a connexion by portage roads across the mountains, in the construction of such roads, and of such other great leading road or roads as shall be established or approved by the National Government. The great progress already made without the aid of this Government in the construction and extension of permanent roads, as well in Virginia and Maryland as in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and all the more Eastern States, is conclusive evidence of a disposition in most or all of the States to promote these objects. In the State of New York, a great turnpike road has been for some time completed almost to Lake Erie, and, in Pennsylvania, the Herculean task of extending a turnpike road of the best construction the whole way from Philadelphia to Pittsburg has been boldly undertaken, and is in a rapid progress of execution. In both these States a great variety of other turnpikes have been long in great perfection, and new ones are annually added. The latter State has, moreover, a great number of bridges, probably among the largest in the world, and founded in solid masonry; and it has also made provision by law for the liberal encouragement of a great work in its neighboring States of Maryland and Delaware.

The foregoing indications, as well as many other considerations, seem fully to authorize the confident reliance upon individual exertion for a full half or more of the resources requisite for the completion of every improvement of national importance in the United States which its Government shall take measures suitably to encourage. The whole expense, by the official report of 1808, already noticed, of a general system of roads and inland navigation, has been, it appears, carefully estimated at $20,000,000. On the assumption that one-half would be contributed by individual and local exertion, $10,000,000 in addition, applied on the part of the United States, would be a sum fully sufficient. These views present another consideration of great weight, that is, the magnitude of the object compared with the expense required to effect it. The object proposed is the facility of intercourse by means of more than ten thousand miles of inland navigation, and more than two thousand miles of permanent roads, besides those already completed in the several States, and such temporary roads through the more unimproved territories as might serve for travelling and for transporting the mails.

The expense to the United States, taken at $10,000,000, supposing $7,000,000 applied to the canals and $3,000,000 to the roads, if an actual expenditure, would be only $700 per mile for the canals, and $1,500 per mile for the two thousand miles of permanent roads; but when it is considered that these sums may not be, strictly speaking, expended, but merely invested by subscription in canal and road stocks, which would ultimately rise to par value, the contrast between the magnitude of the object and that of the capital employed becomes still more strikingly obvious. Nor will these views of the subject appear exaggerated, if we recur to the extent of the navigation proposed to be opened, and consider that most of it would be well adapted for steam vessels; and that the recent origin, the present state, and probable improvement of these cannot, if successful, fail to give to all large rivers, bays, and lakes in the United States, in an improved state, all the advantages of navigable canals of the best artificial construction. In Great Britain more than $100,000,000 has been laid out in constructing about one thousand miles of canal navigation, (that of rivers being little used,) and it is considered of great national advantage. How much stronger are the inducements in the United States to employ a tenth part of that sum in effecting an object of ten times the magnitude?

The committee might enumerate various other considerations in detail, but it is not deemed necessary to do so, since they will be comprised in the general importance of inland navigation and intercourse in the United States, which will now be briefly considered. Internal intercourse is dependent upon internal navigation in a greater or less degree, according to the extent of territory. In the United States, therefore, it must, as has been assumed, depend essentially upon this mean; consequently, the subject must, in the United States, possess a degree of importance unknown in other countries in a political point of view, and must be considered with reference to this principle in connexion with every other advantage to be derived from it.

The general importance of internal navigation is so universally admitted, that any attempt further to illustrate it would seem superfluous, were it not for the fact that it is an object heretofore neglected by the Government of the United States—a circumstance that can hardly be accounted for on any other rational principle than that its intrinsic importance has been somehow overlooked, or hidden in the mass of other concerns, or its advantages been viewed at too remote a distance to induce present activity. From these considerations a few observations are submitted, in which the chief difficulty is, that the case seems too clear to admit of additional proof short of actual consummation. Some will always be found who will call everything theory which is not actually accomplished in practice and in their own possession. Some twenty years ago there was not a turnpike road in the United States. The one between Philadelphia and Lancaster was then called a theory: there are now in the United States some thousand miles of such road; they have become familiar, and we experience little surprise that individuals, in a single State, undertake fearlessly to extend them over the greatest mountains on the Continent. The building of a ship and navigating the ocean has become familiar in the same manner; it is no longer a subject of wonder. But the time probably has been when the simplest raft was the only navigating vehicle; with this man was content until necessity discovered, and experience improved, the use of instruments. Is it not remarkable that, in our present advanced state of civilization and science, man is still little inclined to profit by his reason and intelligence, but disposed always to await the mandate of necessity? Why should an inland navigation be any more a theory than a turnpike road, or the building of a house? Merely because we are more familiar with the latter than with the former. But in Europe a canal navigation is as familiarly known to experience as a ship, a house, or a turnpike; and we have the means of profiting by all the experience of Europe, with the materials and inducements which no country of Europe possesses. They will soon become familiar to us, as turnpike roads have become, if we can only be prevailed upon to attempt them in earnest.

If sea vessels entering the harbors of Boston and New York, respectively, could continue their voyages inland, without interruption, from the former to St. Mary's, in Georgia, from the latter to Lake Erie, and thence to New Orleans, would there remain a doubt of the advantages of such an inland navigation? Would there be found in the United States a single voice to oppose the purchase, if they were to be obtained for 10, or even $20,000,000? Yet such and greater advantages are clearly within our reach for $10,000,000, if that sum can be so applied as to insure the completion of the system of improvement by roads and canals to which the natural advantages of this country invite our attention. A steam navigation would be rendered practicable, not only between the distant points just mentioned, but in all our bays, lakes, and largest rivers—a navigation decidedly superior to that of sea vessels in all narrow channels, as may be inferred, not only from the nature of things, but from the important fact that, while yet in its infancy, it has in a great measure supplanted the long-established use of sea vessels in most of the bays and large rivers of the United States. A detail of the advantages of such a navigation to the United States as a community will not be attempted, because an enumeration and estimate of them is impracticable. A few of the most immediate and prominent effects of a well-digested system of improvement, calculated to insure them to our country, will be merely noticed, leaving every mind to imagine (for imagination can hardly exaggerate) their multiplicity and importance.

1st. No sooner will the National Government have fairly commenced the system, than a general confidence in its completion will be inspired. Its benefits will be felt, in anticipation, in the value of lands, in an increased activity, in the general prosperity, and, consequently, in the revenues of the United States. These, in an average of ten years, will have been increased beyond what they would have otherwise produced by an amount greater than that of the whole sum which will have been expended or employed in the requisite works.

2d. Its operation will tend to perpetuate the Republic and the Union by an indissoluble community of interests, habits, and attachments; to give celerity of movement, and consequent efficiency, to the military force, as well as an easy exchange and distribution of the necessaries of life, whenever the country may be again visited by the calamities of war.

3d. In times of peace or war, it will give a due value to every production of land and labor, whether of agriculture, minerals, forests, fisheries, or mechanic arts; promote, by the certainty of reward, every well-directed branch of domestic industry, the diffusion of science and of morals, the happiness and comfort of the whole community, by the facility of personal and social as well as commercial intercourse.

4th. It cannot fail to add a new and magnified importance to our foreign as well as our domestic commerce, in making it acceptable to all the productions of the most interior parts of this great continent, which productions will continually increase with the population and progress of improvement.

5th, and finally. It would give a new and more elevated character to the nation, to the Republic, in all its domestic concerns, in all its foreign relations, in the comfort, happiness, and prosperity of its citizens, in the permanence of its free institutions, and in the incalculable amount of its public resources.

The same principles and considerations which serve to direct the attention of the committee, in relation to internal navigation, to such routes as are of peculiar national importance, will also point out those roads which seem to require most immediately the attention of the Federal Government, exclusive of portage roads already noticed.

The routes which seem exclusively to claim public and general attention are—

1st. From Maine to Louisiana, in the general direction of the seacoast and main post road, and passing through all the principal seaports. The expense of a good road upon this route may vary according to the construction adopted.

2d. Another object, next, if not equal in importance, would be the improvement, on a less expensive scale, of certain portions of roads leading to the principal naval and military depots and posts, and other important points, in the interior and upon the extremes of the Union. The points contemplated are Sackett's Harbor; Erie, in Pennsylvania; Detroit, in the Michigan Territory; St. Louis, in the Missouri Territory, and New Orleans, in Louisiana.

It remains for the committee to recapitulate the objects of national importance comprised in this report, and to suggest such measures as the general object requires, in their opinion, on the part of the National Government.

The principal improvements requisite to afford the advantages of internal navigation and intercourse throughout the United States and its Territories, are—

1st. Canals through four necks of land from Boston harbor to St. Mary's river, making, altogether, ninety-eight miles, besides a short cut or improvement across Cape Fear, and, as a more distant object, a canal communication, if practicable, from the Altamaha and its waters to Mobile, and from thence to the Mississippi.

2d. A canal from the Hudson or North river to Lake Erie; another from that lake to a navigable branch of the Ohio; some improvement in the bed of said branch, and probably in that of parts of the Ohio river; and a lockage or other improvement at the falls of Louisville.

3d. Improvements, by lockage or otherwise, as the case may require, in each of the principal Atlantic and Southern rivers, and in their respectively correspondent Northern and Western waters.

4th. Turnpike or other permanent roads: 1. Across the mountains or intervening lands, where canals are found impracticable, or not advantageous, between the principal Atlantic and Southern rivers, and one or more of their respective branches, at the highest navigable points, and the nearest navigable points on the correspondent Northern and Western waters: 2. A great turnpike or permanent road from North to South, in the general direction of the seacoast and main post route; and, 3. Improvements, on a less expensive scale, from some convenient point on the main road in York State to the principal military and naval posts and stations on the Northern frontier of that State; from some convenient point or points on the Ohio to the principal military and naval stations and posts upon the Northern frontiers of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan Territory; from Detroit to St. Louis, and from thence to New Orleans.

The measures which appear indispensably requisite, in the first instance, are: 1st. A permanent provision for ascertaining with accuracy the particular route, points, and situations for the best location of the proposed improvements, by procuring draughts or plats, with explicit written descriptions and explanations, from actual surveys and levels, to be taken under the authority of the United States, or otherwise: 2d. To provide the necessary funds for an annual expenditure or application to such improvements, to such amount as may be found advantageous.

With respect to the particular mode in which a portion of the national resources might be most advantageously applied to such objects, that must necessarily vary accordingly to the object and existing circumstances at the time of expenditure, and may be provided for by law from time to time. When any object is purely national, and an expenditure upon it required by the public interest, this would constitute a fit subject for the direct and exclusive application of moneys from the national funds. Such objects, however, are believed to be very rare; so interwoven are the common with the local interests, that the former can hardly be consulted anywhere in relation to internal intercourse without affecting the latter in degrees varying according to circumstances. The necessary existence of this principle seems naturally to recommend the combination of those interests in the same object, under such guards and limitations as may effectually secure the public. The most eligible means to produce this effect are believed to be the establishment of a suitable fund to be invested for accumulation until actually required for its object; and the subscription on account of the United States for portions of the stock of companies incorporated, or which may be incorporated, under State authorities, for constructing such roads and canals, or for effecting such improvements in navigable waters, as shall, upon inspection under the authority of the United States, be approved by the Congress, to be paid out of such fund.

This plan is believed preferable to any other which has occurred to the committee in the essential points of efficiency and economy; to be less liable to any Constitutional doubts, objections, practical difficulties, and at the same time retaining in the National Government a sufficient controlling influence in the selection of the objects of improvement, and over the direction, plan, and construction of the improvement proposed, and in fixing the rates of tolls and charges.

1st. It would be efficient in exciting, encouraging, and calling into activity individual and local enterprise.

2d. It would insure economy, by securing the vigilant guaranty of the same individual and local interest.

3d. Less liable to Constitutional doubts, objections, or practical difficulties, because it would narrow the whole Constitutional question to the single one on which no doubts are known to exist, simply whether the National Government may invest the public money in permanent stocks; and it removes all intricacy and difficulty on the subject of repairs, toll-gates, the collection of tolls, and punishing depredations on the works.

4th. A sufficient controlling influence will be retained in the condition proposed to be prescribed to the subscription, that the proposed undertaking shall first be approved by the Congress.

It may be further remarked, in favor of this mode, that it excludes every idea of erecting in the General Government any improper influence of patronage, which some might apprehend, from the direct application of a large sum of money.

The only desirable object which the mode proposed (of subscription for stock) does not seem to embrace in the fullest extent, is, that of an equalization of the advantages resulting from the application of the national resources to the proposed objects among the several States; but even this desirable object it would approximate more nearly than would a direct application by the National Government.

But if it be deemed necessary and practicable more perfectly to secure this object, a distinct and separate fund should be provided for the purpose, to be distributed among the States as justice may dictate, or according to representation, leaving the former to be employed in the mode proposed. For, if the mode of distribution should be exclusively, or even chiefly, adopted, (and the money given over to the exclusive control and direction of State authorities,) it is evident that the national interests cannot be exclusively, or even chiefly, consulted; they would be abandoned so far as the subject of internal facilities of intercourse extends to the State Government—a course which, if the objects in question be of national importance, and which it is believed few or none can doubt, would not be justified by the Constitution of the United States.

With the foregoing remarks, and reserving for an additional report such further details as the materials which the committee possess and may be enabled to collect during the remainder of the session, the following resolution is submitted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to take measures for ascertaining as far as practicable, and report to this House at the next and every subsequent session of Congress, such roads, canals, and improvements in water-courses as are required in a general system of inland navigation and intercourse throughout the extent of the States and the Territories thereof, best adapted to facilitate the intercourse necessary for personal, commercial, and military purposes.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The following resolution, with the preamble thereto prefixed, was submitted by Mr. KING:

Whereas a bill was yesterday ordered by the House of Representatives to be engrossed and read a third time this day, appropriating one million and a half of dollars of the public money, and the United States share of the dividends in the National Bank, for twenty years, on seven millions of dollars, owned by them therein, and on which they are now paying an annual interest of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for constructing roads and canals; and whereas it is desirable that some part of the public treasure, drawn from the people of the country, should, particularly in times of general distress, be applied to their relief, and to objects connected with their immediate, best, and highest interest: Therefore,

Resolved, That there shall be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated, two millions of dollars, to be apportioned among the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, in proportion to their free population, at the last enumeration; one million thereof to be immediately applied by the Governors of the several States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia, by the several corporations of Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown, to the support of the poor, and in aid of the funds of such humane and charitable institutions, as, in the opinion of such Governors and Corporations, may stand most in need thereof; the other million of dollars to be applied by the Legislatures of the several States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia, by the Congress of the United States, to the promotion of education and the advancement of religion and morality; or in aid of the funds of such Bible and Missionary Societies as may be selected. And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill for the above purposes.

The question being put on considering the said resolution, it was decided in the negative, very few rising in its favor.

The engrossed bill to set apart and pledge, as a fund for internal improvement, the bonus and United States share of the dividends of the National Bank, was read the third time, and the question stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and spoke nearly three hours in opposition.

Mr. SHEFFEY stated the reasons which would prevent his voting for the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN advocated the bill, and replied to Mr. RANDOLPH and others.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. WRIGHT, successively renewed their opposition to the bill; and Mr. CALHOUN again spoke in its support.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 84, as follows:

MONDAY, February 10.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of Joseph Gillard, which was read; when Mr. R. reported a bill confirming the title of Joseph Gillard; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri.

Mr. ROBERTSON also made a report of the petition of Chew and Relf, which was read; when

FEBRUARY, 1817.

Mr. R. reported a bill confirming the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. McKEE, from the committee appointed on the 24th ultimo, by leave of the House, reported a bill transferring the duties of the Commissioners of Loans to the Bank of the United States, and to abolish the offices of Commissioners of Loans; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill from the Senate to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts.

Mr. McKEE, from the same committee, also reported a bill regulating the pay and emoluments of pursers and midshipmen in the Navy, and of the medical staff of the Army, of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. INGHAM, from the committee appointed on the 23d ultimo, reported a bill to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks and messengers; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the select committee to whom was referred the memorial of William Tatham, reported a resolution authorizing the purchase, by the Secretary of War, of the papers and charts, &c., of William Tatham. The report and resolution were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend and explain 'An act giving pensions to the widows and orphans of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States,'" reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from a further consideration of the petitions of Elizabeth Matilda Shubrick, Sophia D. Gardner, and Eliza Tarbell; and they were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill last mentioned.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacint Laval;" and a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and for notifying the persons elected of their election; and have, conformably thereto, appointed a committee on their part; in which bill and resolution they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said resolution was read, and concurred in by the House; and Messrs. JACKSON, IRVING of New York, and PITKIN, were appointed of the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal the second section of an act, entitled 'An act concerning the pay of officers, seamen, and marines in the Navy of the United States,'" reported the same without amendment; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from a further consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor;" and the bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the unfavorable report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, on the petition of Anthony Buck, who prays to be relieved from the payment of an embargo bond, into which, by false representations, Mr. Buck was induced to enter for the captain of an Eastern vessel, and which became forfeited by the misconduct of said captain in violating the embargo. This report gave rise to a long debate, which ended in reversing the report of the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, and directing the committee to report a bill for the relief of the petitioner.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacint Laval," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDEMNITY FOR WAR LOSSES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated, officers and soldiers, and on the several bills committed to the said Committee.

The bill for the relief of certain sufferers during the late war with Great Britain, appropriating the sum of three hundred and forty thousand dollars for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier, was taken up.

Mr. ARCHER moved to amend this bill so as to include the case of losses on the shores of the Chesapeake bay. He referred to the cases of the towns of Havre-de-Grace, Georgetown, and Fredericktown, all on the bay shore, in which depredations had been made by the enemy by conflagrating private property; which cases he considered not materially variant in principle from those which came under this bill. Although the sufferers of this character had no legal claim on the Government, they had a claim of justice; and wherever a Government had the ability to pay such claims, it was its duty to satisfy them. The ability of our Government could not now be questioned, since it had lately made liberal appropriations for internal improvement, and objects not of necessity, &c.

This motion gave rise to a debate which continued until the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to add to the bill a new section, providing that all other claims in all parts of the United States, depending on the same principle as the claims embraced in this bill, should be settled in the same proportion and in the same manner as the claims already enumerated.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out the first section of the bill, and insert, in lieu thereof, a proposition for appropriating a million of dollars for the relief of persons in different parts of the country, who have suffered losses in consequence of military occupation by the forces of the United States, to be distributed in proportion to the loss sustained by each individual, as compared with the residue of his property, the poorest individual to receive the largest sum in proportion to his loss.

This motion, as well as that of Mr. ROBERTSON, before noticed, were declared not receivable until after Mr. ARCHER's motion was decided.

Mr. ARCHER's motion was supported by himself and Mr. WRIGHT, on the general principles on which he introduced it; and was opposed by Messrs. HULBERT, TAYLOR of New York, CLAY, and CALHOUN, not from opposition to the class of claims embraced in the amendment, but on the ground that the claims from the Niagara were peculiar, and had been already sifted and specially examined.

Messrs. ROBERTSON and FORSYTH spoke in favor of general in preference to particular provision on this subject; and Messrs. T. M. NELSON and HARRISON spoke on the military question of the legality, according to the laws of war, of the conflagration of Buffalo, &c., by the enemy.

The Committee rose without deciding any question.

The bill relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war, was reported without amendment; and the Committee had leave to sit again on the remaining bills.

TUESDAY, February 11.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed by a resolution to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the duty on carriages, &c., as imposes a duty on carriages and harness not exceeding in value one hundred dollars, made a report thereon unfavorable thereto; and

Mr. L., from the same committee, made a report on the expediency they were instructed to inquire into, of repealing or modifying the act laying duties on licenses to retailers, adverse thereto.

These reports were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for erecting a light-house on the west chop of Holmes' Hole, in Massachusetts; also, a bill to increase the duty on iron, imported in bars and bolts; and a bill for the relief of Anthony Buck.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Nathaniel Seavey and others.

Which bills were severally read, and committed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee yesterday appointed on that subject, reported the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, by the House:

"Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock: That two persons be appointed tellers, on the part of this House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be delivered. That the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journal of the two Houses."

Messrs. JACKSON and PITKIN were appointed tellers on the part of this House.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON,

Ordered, That when the members of the Senate appear to-morrow, in the Chamber of this House, the President shall be conducted to the Chair of the Speaker; and that the Clerk of this House inform the Senate of these proceedings.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of Congress passed at the last session, as prohibits distillers who have obtained a license from retailing a less quantity of spirits than one gallon."

The House agreed, ayes 62, noes 60, to consider the resolution; when, after a few remarks by Mr. LOWNDES in opposition, and by Mr. WILLIAMS in support of his motion, the question on adopting the resolution was negatived by a large majority.

On motion of Mr. LANGDON, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the revenue laws as not to oblige the vessels navigating Lake Champlain, to enter and take a clearance at the custom-houses in the district of Champlain, in the State of New York and the district of Vermont, where goods are to be landed in each district.

On motion of Mr. WILDE, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States a sum equal to the salary of the judge of the district court of South Carolina, for the term of one year, during which time the said circuit judge was compelled by law to perform the duties of the judge of the said district court.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statements of the amounts collected under the several acts laying direct taxes, &c., together with the amount of compensation allowed to the officers employed in the collection thereof; and also the compensation received by the principal and assistant assessors; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill providing for the reimbursement of moneys paid for the ransom of American captives from the Indians, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. HALL, from the committee appointed on the Message from the President of the United States of the 7th instant, relating to the fourth section of the act of Congress, passed on the 31st March, 1814, providing for the indemnification of certain claimants of public land in the Mississippi Territory, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. H. reported a bill authorizing the payment of money to the State of Georgia, under the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and that State, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the report, in part, of the joint committee of the two Houses, appointed to ascertain and report a mode for examining the votes for President and Vice President; and have appointed Mr. MACON a teller of votes on their part.

COLONIZATION OF FREE NEGROES.

Mr. PICKERING, from the Committee on the African Slave Trade, made a report on the petition of the President and Board of Managers of the American society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, which was read; when Mr. P. reported a joint resolution concerning the abolition of the traffic in slaves, and colonizing free people of color on the continent of Africa, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report and resolution are as follow :

The committee to whom was referred the memorial of the President and Board of Managers of the "American Society for colonizing the free people of color of the United States," have had the same under their deliberate consideration. The subject is of such magnitude, and attended with so many difficulties, it is with much diffidence they present their views of it to the House.

Were it simply a question of founding a colony, numerous and well known precedents show with what facility the work might be accomplished. Every new Territory established by our Government, constitutes indeed a colony, formed with great ease, because it is only an extension of homogeneous settlements. But in contemplating the colonization of the free people of color, it seemed obviously necessary to take a different course. Their distinct character and relative condition render an entire separation from our own States and Territories indispensable. And this separation must be such as to admit of an indefinite continuance. Hence, it seems manifest that these people cannot be colonized within the limits of the United States. If they were not far distant, the rapidly extending settlements of our white inhabitants would soon reach them; and the evil now felt would be renewed, probably with aggravated mischief. Were the colony to be remote, it must be planted on lands now owned and occupied by the native tribes of the country. And could a territory be purchased, the transporting of the colonists thither would be vastly expensive, their subsistence for a time difficult, and a body of troops would be required for their protection. And after all, should these difficulties be overcome, the original evil would at length recur by the extension of our white population. In the meantime, should the colony so increase as to become a nation, it is not difficult to foresee the quarrels and destructive wars which would ensue, especially if the slavery of people of color should continue, and accompany the whites in their migrations.

Turning our eyes from our own country, no other adapted to the colony in contemplation presented itself to our view nearer than Africa, the native land of negroes; and, probably, that is the only country on the globe to which it would be practicable to transfer our free people of color with safety, and advantage to themselves and the civilized world. It is the country which, in the order of Providence, seems to have been appropriated to that distinct family of mankind.—And while it presents the fittest asylum for the free people of color, it opens a wide field for the improvements in civilization, morals and religion, which the humane and enlightened memorialists have conceived it possible, in process of time, to spread over that great continent.

Should the measure suggested be approved, an important question occurs—In what way shall its execution be essayed?

A preliminary step would be, to provide for the perfect neutrality of the colony, by the explicit assent and engagement of all the civilized Powers, whatever dissensions may at any time arise among themselves.

The next important question is—Will it be expedient to attempt the establishment of a new colony in Africa, or to make to Great Britain a proposal to receive the emigrants from the United States into her colony of Sierra Leone?

At Sierra Leone, the first difficulties have been surmounted, and a few free people of color from the United States have been admitted. A gradual addition from the same source (and such would be the natural progress) would occasion no embarrassment either in regard to their sustenance or government. Would the British Government consent to receive such an accession of emigrants, however eventually considerable, from the United States? Would that Government agree that, at the period when that colony shall be capable of self-government and self-protection, it shall be declared independent? In the meantime, will it desire to monopolize the commerce of the colony? This would be injurious to the colonists as well as to the United States. Should that country, from the nature of its soil and other circumstances, hold out sufficient allurements, and draw to it, from the United States, the great body of the free people of color, these would form its strength, and its ability to render its commerce an object of consideration. Now as the great and permanent benefit of the colonists was the fundamental principle of the establishment, will the British Government decline a proposition calculated to give to that benefit the important extension which will arise from a freedom of commerce to those, at least, at whose expense, and by whose means, the colony shall be essentially extended? Should an agreement with Great Britain be effected, no further negotiation, nor any extraordinary expenditure of money, will be required. The work already commenced will be continued, simply of carrying, to Sierra Leone, all who are willing to embark.

It would seem highly desirable to confine the migrations to a single colony. The two distinct and independent colonies, established and protected by two independent Powers, would naturally imbibed the spirit and distinctions of their patrons and protectors, and put in jeopardy the peace and prosperity of both. Even the simple fact of separate independence would eventually tend to produce collisions and wars between the two establishments, (unless, indeed, they were far removed from each other,) and perhaps defeat the further humane and exalted views of those who projected them. The spirit which animated the founders of the colony of Sierra Leone, would be exerted to effect a union of design and the cordial co-operation of the British Government with our own; and, it might be hoped, not without success. It would be in accordance with the spirit of a stipulation in the last Treaty of Peace, by which the two Governments stand pledged to each other to use their best endeavors to effect the entire abolition of the traffic in slaves, while the proposed institution would tend to diminish the quantity of slavery actually existing.

If, however, such enlarged and liberal views should be wanting, then the design of forming a separate colony might be announced by the American Ministers to the maritime Powers; and their guarantee of the neutrality of the colony obtained.

Your committee do not think it proper to pursue the subject any further at this time; but that the Government should wait the result of the suggested negotiations, on which ulterior measures must depend.

In conclusion, your committee beg leave to report a joint resolution, embracing the views herein before exhibited.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to consult and negotiate with all the Governments where Ministers of the United States are, or shall be accredited, on the means of effecting an entire and immediate abolition of the traffic in slaves. And, also, to enter into a convention with the Government of Great Britain, for receiving into the colony of Sierra Leone, such of the free people of color of the United States, as, with their own consent, shall be carried thither, stipulating such terms as shall be most beneficial to the colonists, while it promotes the peaceful interests of Great Britain and the United States. And should this proposition not be accepted, then to obtain from Great Britain, and the other maritime Powers, a stipulation, or a formal declaration to the same effect, guaranteeing a permanent neutrality for any colony of free people of color, which, at the expense and under the auspices of the United States, shall be established on the African coast.

Resolved, That adequate provision shall hereafter be made to defray any necessary expenses which may be incurred in carrying the preceding resolution into effect.

INDEMNITY FOR WAR LOSSES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill appropriating $340,000 for the relief of certain sufferers on the Niagara frontier, in the late war. Mr. ARCHER's motion to amend the bill so as to include the losses on the Chesapeake bay, being under consideration—

Mr. HUNGERFORD moved to amend the amendment, by inserting after Chesapeake bay, the words "and its waters," so as to include losses in the northern neck, &c. of Virginia. Mr. ARCHER received the amendment as a part of his motion.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, required the reading of various documents, depositions, certificates, &c. illustrating and certifying the nature and character of the losses sustained by individuals on the Niagara frontier, and then entered into a defence of the claims of the said sufferers to relief.

Mr. T. M. NELSON replied at length to Mr. CLARK, arguing that no law existed for billeting troops in the houses of the citizens, or their occupation for military, stores, &c., and that all such occupations were of course paid for; which fact he also vouched from his personal knowledge; and that the use of the houses referred to was not only paid for, but at an enormous rent. Mr. N. read sundry official letters, &c., to establish his views of the illegality of the claims of the sufferers, the laws of war, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, argued in support of the bill, the principle of which had been sanctioned by the adoption of the 9th section of the claims law of last session, which section had not been objected to, and the repeal of which did not take place from any change of opinion as to the propriety of the principle, but from a fear of its abuse, by the construction which had been given to it, and because it was presumed that it could be administered with greater correctness by this House. He contended, also, that the motive of retaliation alleged by the enemy for the destruction of property on the Niagara frontier was a mere pretext, and, although he was willing to indemnify by some general provision the sufferings on the Chesapeake, the river Raisin, &c., yet the amendment was not grounded on any principle yet decided on, as in the case of the Niagara sufferers, and for that reason he should not vote now to incorporate the motion in this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT followed in opposition to indemnifying the sufferers on the Niagara: to whom

Mr. GOLD and Mr. HARRISON replied and advocated strenuously the relief of those sufferers.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, declared himself in favor both of the amendment and original bill, and spoke some time in support thereof.

Mr. PICKERING was opposed to the bill in any shape which it could assume, because Congress had already authorized a strict inquiry into all losses by the late war, and that the confiscation of the Niagara frontier was an act of retaliation for burning the town of Newark, which was unauthorized in civil warfare, and unnecessary.

Mr. ROOT replied to Mr. PICKERING, and advocated at some length the justice of extending relief to the sufferers in question.

Mr. HARRISON defended the destruction of Newark by the American troops, and had no doubt that, if Mr. PICKERING was to view the situation of that town, and its relation to Fort Niagara, he would approve the burning of it; and Mr. H. was willing to stake his military reputation on the propriety of that measure, as a military one, which every military man would sanction.

Mr. PICKERING replied, that the destruction of Newark was alleged to be in defence of Fort George, and not Fort Niagara.

Mr. PETER expressed the objections he entertained to the amendment proposed by Mr. ARCHER, and stated his reasons for deeming the destruction of Newark unauthorized by military law, and unnecessary.

Mr. ARCHER again supported his amendment, and replied to the arguments of those who condemned the burning of Newark, which he said was done with the double view of defending Fort George, and ultimately Fort Niagara.

The question was at length taken on Mr. ARCHER's motion, and decided in the negative.

After going through the bill, and making some immaterial amendments—

Mr. FORSYTH moved the amendment he yesterday suggested, to strike out the first section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the appropriation of a million of dollars for the relief of persons in different parts of the country, who have suffered losses in consequence of military occupation by the forces of the United States, to be distributed in proportion to the loss sustained by each individual, as compared with the residue of his property—the poorest individual to receive the largest sum, in proportion to his loss.

The question was taken thereon without debate, and decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. FORSYTH then, as he doubted whether this bill, after all the time it should consume, had a majority in its favor, and for the purpose, therefore, of saving time, by at once trying the sense of the House on it, moved to strike out the first section—in effect to destroy it.

This motion was negatived by a considerable majority; when the Committee rose, reported the bill as amended, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 12.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of Hezekiah Niles and Jehu Chandler, stating that they have it in contemplation to establish a national printing office and stationery store at the Seat of Government, and praying for the protection and support of the National Legislature in their undertaking.—Referred to a select committee. And Mr. YANCEY, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. NEWTON, Mr. INGHAM, and Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, were appointed the committee.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Mary Wells; on the petition of James Orr; on the petition of William Oliver; on the petition of Peter Kendall; and on the petition of Berthelemy Duverges;—which were severally read. When Mr. Y. reported bills of the following titles, to wit: A bill for the relief of Mary Wells; a bill for the relief of James Orr; a bill for the relief of William Oliver; a bill for the relief of Peter Kendall; and a bill for the relief of Berthelemy Duverges;—which said bills were severally read the first and second time, and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.

ELECTORAL VOTES FOR PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, a message was sent to the Senate, informing them that the House of Representatives were ready to proceed, agreeably to the mutual resolution of yesterday, to open and count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Senate, soon after, entered the House of Representatives, preceded by their President, who was received by the Speaker at the Chair of the House, in which the President of the Senate took his seat, and the Speaker of the House beside him. The Tellers of the two Houses—Mr. MACON on the part of the Senate, and Mr. JACKSON and Mr. PIRKIN on the part of the House of Representatives—occupied seats in front of the Chair.

The seals of the votes were broken by the President of the Senate, and by him handed to the Tellers, by whom they were read aloud, and recorded on the Journals of the Senate and of the House of Representatives by the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House, respectively.

The votes of all the States having been read, with the exception of those of the State of Indiana—

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, arose, and (addressing himself to the Speaker of the House,) expressed his unfeigned regret at being compelled, by his sense of duty, to interrupt the proceeding of the two Houses. Mr. T. was then going on to state his reasons for objecting to the votes from Indiana being read and recorded; when

The SPEAKER interrupted him, and said, that the two Houses had met for the purpose—the single, specific purpose—of performing the Constitutional duty which they were then discharging, and that while so acting, in joint meeting, they could consider no proposition nor perform any business not prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. VARNUM, of the Senate, (addressing the President of the Senate,) expressed his concurrence in the propriety of what had been stated by the Speaker, and, for the purpose of allowing the House of Representatives to deliberate on the question which had been suggested, he moved that the Senate withdraw to their Chamber.

The motion was seconded by Mr. DANA, of the Senate, and the question being put by the President to the members of the Senate, it was unanimously agreed to; and the Senate withdrew accordingly.*

* [From the National Intelligencer.]

Messrs. GALES & SEATON :

In your paper of this morning, in detailing the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress relating to counting the votes for President and Vice President, you state that the motion made by Mr. VARNUM, and seconded by Mr. DANA, that the Senate should withdraw, was "unanimously agreed to." This, gentlemen, is a mistake. There were several negatives, distinctly and audibly given, and a division being called for, it is doubtful how the question would have been decided. The writer of this was one of those who voted against the motion, believing that the two Houses ought not to separate until they had discharged the duty which brought them together, and that in counting the votes, it was for them to decide what were votes in the meaning of the Constitution. Reflection has confirmed him in this opinion; and regarding the precedent set by the Senate's withdrawing as one which it would be inconvenient and dangerous to follow, he is not willing to see it recorded as an unanimous act, when Electoral Votes for President.

H. OF R.

The SPEAKER having stated to the House that it now remained for them to consider the subject which had interrupted the forms of the Constitution—

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, that, although the question, as regarded the present election, was of no consequence, yet the time might arrive when it would be of the greatest importance in the election of President of the United States, and that it would be better to settle it now, when its decision would not affect the election. He then proceeded with his objections to receiving the votes from Indiana, contending that the joint resolution of December last, admitting that State into the Union, was not a matter of form merely, but a great Constitutional prerogative, to be exercised by Congress; until which, a sister State could not be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing. If this was not so, where was the use of passing on the form of Government adopted by the State, and sanctioning her admission, if she was admitted to an equal footing already?

the reverse of the case, and thereby a weight and importance given, which do not in reality belong to it.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 14, 1817.

[No doubt, whatever is entertained of the correctness of the above statement, for which we are much indebted to the writer, but the Reporter certainly heard not a single negative.

Having stated the proceedings of the House of Representatives on the question referred to in the above note, it may be proper to notice what, we learn, took place in the Senate, after that body withdrew from the House.

On retiring to their Chamber, some conversation took place in the Senate, on the subject which had produced the separation of the two Houses; when

Mr. BARNOUN moved the adoption of a resolution, that the State of Indiana had a right, by her Electors, to vote for President and Vice President, on the first Monday in December last.

This resolution was supported by Messrs. TALBOT, MASON of New Hampshire, BARNOUN, DANA, and DAGGETT; and opposed by Messrs. CAMPBELL and FROMENTIN.

Before any decision took place on the resolution, the message from the House of Representatives, announcing their readiness to proceed in counting the votes, was received; when

Mr. BARNOUN stated, that as the question which had interrupted the proceedings of the joint meeting originated in the other House, and they having announced their readiness to resume the business which had called the two Houses together, it was unnecessary, he thought, to take any order on the resolution he had submitted, and therefore withdrew it.

The Senate then again proceeded to the Representatives Hall.

On Thursday, the next morning, there was a considerable discussion on the question how the proceeding of the preceding day should be stated on the Journal of the Senate, since, being novel in its character, the proceeding might be drawn into precedent on occasions of more importance than the present. It was finally resolved, that the Journal should be made "according to former precedents."—Editors National Intelligencer.

The Electors of President and Vice President having been elected in Indiana before she was declared to be admitted into the Union by Congress, he thought the votes of that State were no more entitled to be counted than if they had been received from Missouri, or any other Territory of the United States. Mr. T. acknowledged he did not know what would be the most proper course of proceeding in the business, but believed it would be best to adopt a joint resolution, that the votes of Indiana, having been given previous to her admission into the Union, were illegal, and ought not to be received.

Mr. CADY, of New York, thought the question already settled, as another branch of the Legislature had admitted the Senators from the new State to all the privileges of other members of that body; that, after admitting the Representatives of the State to act in Congress on all the concerns of the nation, it was too late to question her right to participate in this; and that, from the moment the constitution of the State was assented to, she was entitled to all the privileges of an independent member of the Union.

Mr. SHARP, of Kentucky, for the purpose of settling the question, offered a joint resolution, "That the votes for Electors of the State of Indiana, for President and Vice President of the United States, were properly and legally given, and ought to be counted."

Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, thought the resolution ought not to be a joint one, as it might establish a precedent which might in time, in the case of a tie, &c., deprive this House of one of its powers, by permitting the Senate to participate in this question.

Mr. CALHOUN suggested to Mr. SHARP, whether it would not be better to offer his resolution in the negative form. He, for one, did not believe the votes improper, but the question would be put to rest with more certainty, he thought, by rejecting it in the negative shape, than it would by agreeing to it in its present form.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to amend the resolution, by substituting therefor a motion declaring the votes illegal, &c.

Mr. SHEFFEX said this question was settled already; for, if they had no right to give votes in the organization of the Executive, they had none in the National Legislature. We have decided, said Mr. S., that the organization of their State government is correct; we said to them in the act, if they performed certain duties, they were entitled to admission into the Union upon an equal footing with the other States; and the resolution to admit them was merely a declaration that they had so performed that duty. The proposition before the House, Mr. S. thought, was wrong, and that the State was certainly entitled to the votes.

Mr. SHARP defended his motion, and the joint form he had given to it, as necessary to ascertain the joint sense of the two Houses, without which they could not know whether the Senate were willing to proceed. The argument of Mr. SHEFFEX, he said, was a clear exposition of the right of the vote. Congress was bound to see that the new State adopted a Republican form of government, but that, said he, was all we had to do with them; but the recognition of that could not affect their right to vote, nor any other right or privilege of an independent State, endowed with all the powers of the others, as the votes had been given after they had performed the condition required of them to become an independent State.

Mr. GASTON thought the only difficulties were as to the form the House ought to adopt. With regard to the question, he was under no difficulty; according to the act of last session the votes were legal, and rightfully given. Mr. G. read the provisions of the act of last session, authorizing Indiana to form a State government, which left it to them to choose a name, prescribed the qualifications of electors of delegates to the convention, which delegates were to determine whether it was expedient at that time to form a constitution, &c.; and if they determined that it was expedient, then they were authorized to form a constitution; and that determination was the act that made the Territory a State. Had they adopted a constitution not Republican, they would have done what they were unauthorized to do, and all their proceedings would have been illegal. But what, Mr. G. presumed, would remove all difficulty, were propositions in the act, which, if accepted, was to be obligatory on the parties; such as that all salt springs should be granted to said State, for the use of the people thereof, in such manner as the Legislature should direct, &c. The acceptance of this proposition by Indiana was obligatory on the United States; then was called into existence the new State; and it had been recognised by both branches of the National Legislature, by admitting into their respective bodies the Senators and Members from the State. Mr. G., though opposed to the amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR, was not certain that the other motion would be proper, but was inclined to think that the better course would be merely to send a message to the Senate, that the House was ready to proceed in counting the votes.

Mr. TAYLOR was not satisfied by the arguments he had heard. Suppose the convention of Indiana had formed a constitution manifestly not Republican, would they then, he asked, have been entitled to vote for Electors? He would put another case. The act of last session prescribed the number of delegates which should be elected by each county to the convention; suppose the convention to have formed a Republican constitution, but that the counties should have sent three times the number of delegates authorized by the act of Congress, would not Congress see that the whole course of proceedings was proper; and would not their incipient acts be ineffectual until Congress had decided on them? The admission of the member into this House, no other appearing to claim the seat, was different from the right of voting in the present election; and until the State was declared a member of the Union, it was not to be so considered so far forth as to entitle it to vote for President and Vice President. If not so, it was an idle thing for Congress, in December last, to declare their admission into the Union.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, regretted the agitation of this question, as he could not recognise the right of this House or the Senate to decide on the rights of the States, and to question the sovereignty of an independent State after its admission into the Union, was a matter of dangerous tendency. The State of Indiana, professing to be such, had sent members to this House and to the Senate, who had been admitted to all the privileges of legislation. Was it said Congress had not used due deliberation in admitting those members; and had the State done any more in electing Electors, than in sending her members to represent her in Congress? You cannot now, said Mr. R., raise a question of State or no State. The condition requiring the State to adopt a Republican constitution was a matter of course, because the United States were bound to guaranty such a constitution to each State; and the joint resolution of December last was a mere declaration that the State had complied with the obligation.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, was of opinion that the State was entitled to all State rights, as soon as they had complied with the requisitions of the act authorizing the people of the Territory to form a State government. The case of Louisiana was different, because the act authorizing that Territory to adopt a State government, required that their constitution should be submitted to Congress before their admission into the Union. With Indiana the case was different, as with her no such condition was made. The question before the House, Mr. P. said, was a novel one; resolutions had been passed by the two Houses to assemble for a certain purpose therein stated, and the most proper way would be to send a message to the Senate, that the House was ready to proceed in the business of counting the votes.

Mr. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, regretted the necessity which called him up. Indiana, he said, was, or was not a State, and the decision of that question would settle the one before the House. The case of Louisiana was not analogous; as the ordinance of 1787, concerning the Territories, and under which they were admitted into the Union, did not apply to any Territory west of the Mississippi. The only question for Congress to decide was, whether the State had complied with the requisition of the act of last session—whether the constitution adopted was Republican or not—nothing more. Suppose, indeed, that the State had adopted no constitution at all; had chosen to live under their laws alone, and had not thrown their State government into the form of a constitution, would the State have been thereby deprived of her rank in the Union? The ordinance of '87 had guaranteed a State government when they reached a certain extent of population, and Congress could require of them no more than had been done. Mr. H. argued, that the same authority which gave him a right to vote in this House, gave them also a right to vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, moved that the resolution and amendment be both indefinitely postponed; which motion was agreed to almost unanimously; and then,

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, a message was sent to the Senate, informing them of the readiness of this House to proceed in counting the votes.

The Senate soon after again entered the Representatives Hall; when

The SPEAKER informed them, that the House of Representatives had not seen it necessary to come to any resolution, or to take any order on the subject which had produced the separation of the two Houses.

The reading of the votes was then concluded; and the Tellers handed a statement thereof to the President of the Senate, who announced to the joint meeting the following as the state of the votes:

TOMPKINS, of the State of New York, was duly elected Vice President of the United States, for the like term of four years, to commence on the said fourth day of March next.

The two Houses then separated, the Senate returned to their Chamber, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 13.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing importers of goods into New Orleans, and destined for Cincinnati, to give bond for the payment of the duties, to a collector to be appointed to reside at Cincinnati, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington," reported the same with amendments, which were read, agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill as amended to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. WILDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States an additional compensation, made a favorable report; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1817.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter, deceased."

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the same committee to which was also committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to appoint additional pension agents," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts."

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to extend the privilege of franking to the Ordnance department and Patent Office; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, made a report against the petitions of sundry inhabitants of Lower Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, and the resolution of the General Assembly of that State in their behalf, and against the petitions of sundry inhabitants of Montgomery county, in the said State of Ohio; which reports were read, and agreed to.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act for the relief of Daniel T. Patterson and George T. Ross, and the officers and men lately under their command," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act relating to the ransom of American captives of the late war," was read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY REPORTS AND BILLS.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Peyton Short; on the petition of Asa Wells; and on the petition of Charles Williams;—which reports were severally read. When Mr. Y. reported bills of the following titles, to wit: A bill for the relief of Peyton Short; a bill for the relief of Asa Wells; and a bill for the relief of Charles Williams;—which said bills were severally read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud.

The report on the petition of Peyton Short is as follows:

That the petitioner entered into a contract with one Thomas Marshall, an agent of the United States, to furnish the Government with a large quantity of whiskey, at 3s. 6d. per gallon. A controversy arising out of the contract, the petitioner was sued by the United States, in the federal court of Kentucky; and, at the time of trial, being absent from the court, his counsel consented that judgment should be entered against him for five hundred dollars, subject to the equity of his case. The petitioner afterwards, being dissatisfied with the judgment of the court, filed a bill of injunction; and, upon a full and equitable hearing of the cause, the court decreed that there was a balance against the petitioner of one hundred and fifty dollars seventeen cents and nine mills, in favor of the United States; and that the balance of the judgment at law, which is stated at one hundred and eighty-two dollars two cents and nine mills, should be perpetually enjoined. The petitioner discharged that part of the debt which was decreed against him; but, subsequent to the decree, (to wit, in November, 1814,) the court decided that it had no jurisdiction of the cause, and ordered it to be dismissed; upon which, an execution issued against the property of the petitioner for the balance of the judgment.

It appears, from a copy of an execution from the district court of Kentucky, that the petitioner has paid, or is ready to pay, the balance which the court decreed against him when his cause was considered as in a court of equity.

The committee, assuming as a fact that the cause, when it was heard by the federal court as a court of equity, was equitably and justly decided between the public and a citizen, have not considered it necessary to investigate the original merits of the case. They are of opinion that the petitioner, having paid the amount decreed against him, is entitled to relief, as regards the balance of the judgment at law, and report a bill to that effect.

The report on the petition of Asa Wells is as follows:

That, in the year 1808, the petitioner, as lieutenant, with a detachment of men under his command, was ordered by the Governor of New York to march to Oswego, in that State, for the purpose of aiding the collector of the district and port of Oswego, in the execution of the duties and powers of his office in executing the laws of the United States. While the petitioner was stationed at Oswego, he received orders from the collector of the port to proceed, with thirty-five men, to Salmon river and Big Sandy creek, to search for potash, or any other articles which might be there deposited, indicating a belief that they were about to be smuggled into Canada, and to seize boats which might be found there without regular papers. Some boats were found at Sandy creek, and seized by the petitioner and his party. Those who had them in possession, no doubt, from circumstances, intended running them off as soon as they found it convenient. The masts, sails, and oars of the boat were secreted in the adjacent woods; but they were discovered, and also seized. A number of persons, supposed to be about eighty, assembled and demanded of the petitioner and his men that the property which had been seized should be restored, and stating their determination, if it were not restored, to take it by force. They were ordered to disperse and retire; and, having refused to do so, ten of them were taken by the petitioner, and sent to the garrison at Oswego, and, by the commanding officer of the garrison, they were sent to the jail in Onondaga. For this proceeding the petitioner was sued, in ten several suits, by the party he had arrested; and, after the return of the writs in each case, and before the trial of the causes, the plaintiffs left the State of New York, and the suits have all been dismissed for the want of prosecution by those who commenced them; the consequence of which is, that the defendant, in each case, has been compelled to pay costs to the amount of $488 95.

The law of the State of New York authorizes a resident citizen of the State to commence a suit without giving security for the payment of the costs if the plaintiff should fail in the suit. But if one who was a citizen at the commencement of the suit removes from the State, he may be compelled to give security for the prosecution of the suit, or have it dismissed; and if the counsel of the plaintiff should continue to prosecute the suit after the plaintiff has removed, he may be made answerable for the costs which may have accrued after removal. The counsel in those cases against the petitioner, upon this principle, was compelled, by order of the court, to pay of the costs in the suits $122 40.

The petitioner prays that Congress would pay him the sum which he has been compelled to pay under these circumstances.

The Committee are of opinion he is entitled to relief, and therefore report a bill to that effect.

INDEMNITY FOR WAR LOSSES.

The bill for the relief of certain sufferers (on the Niagara frontier) by the late war, was taken up and further amended. On the question to order the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—principally on the ground that there was a bill on the same subject before the Senate, the decision on which was materially connected with that now before the House. The motion was opposed by Mr. CLARK, of New York, and Mr. GOLD, and supported by Mr. INGHAM and Mr. PICKERING. The question for laying the bill on the table was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 53, as follows:

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill for the civil expenses of the United States. This bill is generally a matter of form and detail merely, setting apart from the Treasury, for disbursements, sums of money already authorized by law to be paid. There was considerable discussion on some minor questions arising in the bill, particularly in regard to the payment of the expenses of an additional clerk, found necessary to have been employed in the office of the Commissioner of Claims; which allowance was finally agreed to. The Committee rose, reported the bill, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 14.

Mr. TYLER presented a petition of sundry merchants of the district of Richmond, in the State of Virginia, and of owners and masters of vessels trading to and from the said district, praying that the moneys collected in said district, under the act for the relief and protection of sick and disabled seamen may be expended therein.—Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of a society of cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, called the "Amosophic Society," praying for an act of incorporation; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Maryland, stating that it is their intention to run a line of stages from Baltimore, by Fredericktown, and over the Cumberland road to the Ohio river, praying that the Postmaster General may be directed to enter into a contract with them for transporting the mail on the route aforesaid.—Referred to the Postmaster General.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to repeal so much of an act, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," passed April 27, 1816, as limits the laying and collecting a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem on certain goods, to the 30th June, 1819; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to increase the duty on iron in bars and bolts.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, in reply to the resolution requesting him to report the reasons why the militia fines incurred under the late call of the militia into the service of the United States are not finally collected. [Stating that by reference to the acts of Congress of February 28, 1795, and the 2d of February, 1813, the War Department has no control in relation to the collection of fines assessed by courts martial, appointed for the trial of delinquent militiamen, and therefore the department cannot furnish the information required by the resolution.]

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement showing the quantity of public lands sold, and the receipts therefor, in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and the Illinois and Mississippi Territories, during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1816; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, the Secretary of War was directed to lay before this House any information in the possession of that department relative to the claims of the State of Massachusetts, for payment of the expenses of the militia ordered out by the Executive authority of that State during the late war.

INTERNAL DUTIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the internal duties be repealed, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for that purpose.

The question of considering the resolution, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Atherton, Baylies, Bennett, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Brooks, Bryan, Cady, Cannon, Carr of Mass., Cilley, Clark of New York, Clendennin, Cooper, Culpeper, Desha, Edwards, McLean, Middleton, Miller, Thomas M. Nelson, Ormsby, Robertson, Root, Savage, Schenck, Tallmadge, Taylor of New York, Wilde, Wilkin, Woodward, and Yancey.

A debate of some length ensued on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to lay the resolution on the table; but the debate continuing, before the question was taken thereon,

Mr. LOWNDES moved to proceed to the orders of the day; which motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Archer, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Birdseye, Breckenridge, Brown, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark of New York, Clayton, Comstock, Condict, Cooper, Creighton, Davenport, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Harrison, Hendricks, Huger, Ingham, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, Law, Little, Lowndes, William P. APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CANNON then moved that the order of the day, being the report of the Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill, be laid on the table for the purpose of taking up the resolution, submitted some weeks since, declaring it expedient to reduce the Army.

After some discussion on the propriety of postponing the appropriation bill, for the object avowed by the mover, the question was taken thereon, and decided in the negative—ayes 56, nays 73; and the House then proceeded to the consideration of the appropriation bill and the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole thereon.

The amendments were variously disposed of, and the only considerable departure from the report of the Committee of the Whole was the reduction of the appropriation of $72,000 for intercourse with the Barbary Powers. This sum was stricken out, on motion of Mr. ROOT, who then moved to fill the bill with $20,000; it was, however, filled, on motion of Mr. INGHAM, with $47,000, (the sum appropriated last year,) and then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, was read the third time, and passed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the military service.

This bill is usually considered as a matter of form, and the blanks in it filled of course with the estimates from the proper Departments.

Some debate took place, incidentally, on the practice, authorized by law, and heretofore prevailing, to a great extent, of transferring appropriations from one branch of service to another, a practice which was much disapproved. Some animadversions were also made on the expenses of the Government, pronounced to be of overgrown amount, and requiring curtailment. This debate was abstract in its nature, applied particularly to no proposition before the House, but to others which had been suggested for securing accountability for the public money, and the rigid application of appropriations to specific objects. Particular objection was also made to the amount of appropriation for the Quartermaster's department for the Northern and Southern divisions, which was pronounced enormous, and under which, it is said, without further appropriation by law, extensive barracks have been built, under the authority of the War Department. The appropriation for the Quartermaster's department of the Southern division, ($450,000,) recommended in the estimate of the War Department, was rejected by a few votes, on the ground of its large amount, and the want of regulation in that department; but was soon afterwards reconsidered, and, after further debate, agreed to by a large majority.

[The gentlemen who took part in the debate, were MESSRS. LOWNDES, CALHOUN, SMITH, of Maryland, MCKEE, HARRISON, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky.]

The following is the substance of Mr. CALHOUN's observations:

Mr. CALHOUN called the attention of the Committee to the correspondence between the Committee of Ways and Means and the acting Secretary of War. It seemed by that correspondence that, besides other instances of transfers of the money appropriated by Congress, from the objects to which it was intended, to some other not contemplated, the money appropriated to the construction of arsenals had in part been applied to the repairing of arms and erecting accommodations for the Quartermasters. These might be proper objects of expenditure. This was not the point of his censure. He objected that the money had not been applied to the objects for which it was appropriated. It was a sheer abuse of power, not justified by the existing laws, as lax as they unfortunately are on this point. The law authorizes a transfer (under the immediate direction of the President) of the money appropriated, from one object to another object also authorized; and in every instance, in which it is not done by his authority, or in which it is applied to an object not authorized, or where there has been a transfer of appropriation from an object, without there being a surplus of the sum appropriated to that object, he conceived it to be an abuse. The further we progress in this business, the more apparent is the necessity of abolishing the whole power of transfers. It has and will continue to introduce confusion and abuses in the disbursements of the public money. He regretted that the Committee of Ways and Means had not acted on the resolution which he introduced on this subject at an early period of the session; and, as late as it was, he hoped that they would report before its termination.

Every one, said he, who has been a member of this House long enough to make the observation, must be struck with the different degrees of attention which an appropriation and a tax bill excites. To the latter there is all attention, while the former excites less than most others; in fact there are few bills that excite less. What produces this difference? It is not because one is less important than the other. If in this respect there is any difference, he conceived that the former was most important. In laying a tax, there might indeed be danger of oppression, but if the appropriation is made to useless objects, or, what is worse, if the public officers are permitted to abuse their trust and squander the public money, it is lost to the community. Why, then, the difference of interest which they excite? It is to be found in a difference of their nature. The people know and feel the amount of taxes. It is generally unpopular to lay them, and popular to repeal. Stimulated by these motives, there are many who are ready to prove their zeal in this particular service; and to move their repeal whenever they can be spared, and even when they cannot without manifest detriment to the public. Very different is the case of the disbursements of the public money. Whether that is done with a due regard to the public interest, or whether it is fairly and honestly applied, are facts that excite in the people far less interest, because they are not so open to public observation. If the member who devoted his labor to the examination of the public accounts and the correcting of abuses was as certain to reap the reward of popular favor as he who moved the repeal of taxes, there would not exist so many abuses as there now are.

If the member from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) really wishes to render the public essential service, let him turn his attention to the bill now before the House, and not to the repealing of the taxes, before he knows whether they can be spared or not. This is the real path of patriotism, and, as the path of duty usually is, rugged and steep. It is in the disbursements of the public money that those dangerous disorders first strike, which finally end in the destruction of liberty. Abuses of this kind cannot be permitted without endangering the principles of our Constitution. It is in their nature to grow; and what was embezzlement at first becomes right in a few years. It is thus, if tolerated, an interest will grow in favor of abuses, which, from its nature, must ever be opposed to the power and reputation of this House. They who fatten on the public will be persuaded that, by destroying your political weight, they not only render themselves secure in their lawless gain, but that they may be greatly enlarged. Such an interest is ever in favor of the power of a single ruler. Hence is the necessity on our part, as the guardians of the community, to be vigilant, to suppress the first symptoms of abuse. We have the sole power to raise and apply money. It is the sinew of our strength. Not a cent of money ought to be applied, but by our direction, and under our control. How stands the fact? We are told that most extensive and superb stone barracks, sufficient to receive two thousand troops, have, the last year, been erected near Sackett's Harbor, though not a cent was appropriated to this object. It is even reported to have been done without the consent of the War Department. It is further stated that a military road is constructing from Detroit to Ohio. The barracks and road may be proper; if the soldiers are to be employed on them, it is much better than an idle garrison life. In fact, he knew not how the military can, in peace, be better employed than in constructing of such roads as may be useful in war. It was not to the thing itself that he objected. He censured the application of the public money to such objects, without ever submitting the question to Congress. It is an evil that cannot be tolerated, unless we are ready to become mere cyphers. These were not the only abuses. There were many, he feared, particularly in the Army.

In making these statements, Mr. C. was actuated by no ill will to any one. If it had been his misfortune to feel such, he could not be actuated by it in the discharge of his public duties, without forgetting all his principles. He stated them simply because he thought the best interest of the country required that they should be known and corrected. He could not agree with his friend from Kentucky (Mr. McKEE) that all efforts at correcting such abuses are hopeless. He says it has not been done; and concludes therefore that it cannot. Mr. C. thought differ-ently. There has been nothing like a concentrated and steady effort to effect the cure; nor had the times ever been so propitious. When party spirit is high, it is very difficult to undertake reformations of this kind. Factionous views are sure to be attributed, and attributed with success, to the member who attempts it. Happily for us party spirit has, in a great measure, disappeared. We have peace not only abroad, but at home. Now, then, is the moment for this most salutary work. A proper degree of labor and firmness cannot fail of success. Very melancholy indeed would be our situation, if the evil were too inveterate to be cured but by lopping off the whole strength of the Government, as proposed by some. What, then, are the means which he proposed? In the first place, Mr. C. conceived it to be indispensable that our appropriations should be made in many respects more specific. He rejoiced to see the Committee of Ways and Means commence this system in the Ordnance department, and hoped they would extend it to the Quartermaster's, and to other heads where a general appropriation was now made. But specific appropriations were of no avail, under our present system of transfers. If that power of dispensing with law is to continue, he would be adverse to any estimates, but would put the gross amount of revenue under the direction of the President, to be used as he thought proper. It is then indispensable, that the right of transferring, or rather dispensing with appropriation, be repealed and prohibited. In the next place, the year for the appropriation and for expenditure should coincide. As it now stands, the appropriation is made for the year commencing the first of January, and the expenditure, for what is called the fiscal, commencing the 1st of October. The effect is, that we can never, without great labor, compare the appropriation of money to an object, with the expenditure. They both ought, in my opinion, to be made for the fiscal year; and, if we will insist that the accounts of expenditures be fully made up and laid before us early every session, it will of itself do much to reform. But to give the measures full success, we must proceed one step further. The committees appointed at the last session, on expenditures, must go to the respective officers, and descend into the details. This is indispensable, and it ought to be their duty to report the state of the expenditure fully to this House. He regretted that they had not done so this session. If these steps be pursued, and if the members of this House will turn their displeasure against any officer, from the highest to the lowest, who permits abuses, a great and immediate reform must be the immediate effect. We shall, then, no longer hear of arrearages, and accounts unsettled for years. Abuses will thus be corrected in the infancy, and the purity of our institutions preserved. He could not give into the system that to prevent abuses the taxes must be abolished. He saw no termination to the system, but in an entire prostration of the power of Government. In his opinion, our relation to the rest of the world did not admit of that system. We stand alone; all other established Governments were entirely dissimilar from ours. We ought to be the strong man armed. We knew not when the whole of our strength might be needed. He was not an alarmist; but in his opinion self-defence is the first of political duties. He hoped that peace, moderation, and justice, would ever be pursued by our councils; and that the fruit would be exemption from war. But we ought to be prepared for the worst. His policy was to draw freely from the people when the public interest requires it; but to see that the public money be truly, wisely, and economically applied. He could not agree with the member from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) in dispensing with the internal taxes. Instead of that system, let us maintain them, and apply as much of our revenue as possible to the discharge of the public debts. He was no friend to a debt, large or small. He wished it to be paid off to the last cent immediately. Behold in England the ultimate effects of a debt accumulating from age to age! A population of the most unparalleled industry bowed to the dust by the pressure. Let us profit by the example, and, in this moment of peace and prosperity, remove the public burden. Having performed this act of justice to posterity, we then may make reductions in the amount of taxes, both external and internal; and, should it be our misfortune to be involved in hostility, we would find ourselves freed from debt, and with perfect method and economy introduced into our money transactions. Thus happily situated, the full energy of the public power might be executed, and danger be met with a greater prospect of success.

The bill having been gone through, it was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SATURDAY, February 15.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry merchants of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, stating that previous to the year 1800, many of their vessels, with their cargoes, were captured by French cruisers, and condemned by the French tribunals, and that their claims to indemnity on the French Government were abandoned by the Government of the United States, in the convention of 1850; and praying such relief in the premises as it may be in the power of the Government to grant; which petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, in pursuance of the joint resolution "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election," made a further report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PICKENS, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, to which was referred the petition of Colonel James Thomas, late a Quartermaster

General in the armies of the United States, and the report of the select committee made at the last session upon the settlement of his accounts, made a detailed report thereon; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PICKENS, from the same committee, also made a report on that part of the petition of the said Colonel Thomas, which relates to his claim for extra-official services and for expenses incurred in transporting his baggage; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the claims of Colonel Thomas, referred to in his petition, for extra services and expenses, ought not to be allowed.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacint Laval," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting information respecting the expense of the Military Academy at West Point, from the year 1801, to 1816, the number of students educated at the said academy, and of the number of those who have been appointed officers in the Army of the United States, rendered in pursuance of the resolution of this House of the 25th ultimo; which were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the Acting Secretary of War was ordered to cause to be laid before this House the official report made to the Adjutant and Inspector General, and by whom made, of the mutiny said to have taken place at Norfolk, of a part of the late 38th United States' regiment of infantry, together with the names and number of those concerned in said mutiny.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws imposing duties on distilleries, so as to allow persons distilling spirits from fruit the option of paying the duty on the quantity distilled.

On motion of Mr. BETTS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the state and usual disposition of the funds under control of the district court of the United States, and into the expediency of requiring from the officers of those courts additional securities in relation to such funds.

An engrossed bill entitled, "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817," was read the third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the unfinished business of yesterday—being the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the year 1817.

The bill underwent some changes in committee, besides the necessary duty of filling the blanks—amongst them, the rejection of the section making an appropriation for the erection and completion of buildings at West Point, which motion was sustained on the ground, that the buildings had been commenced without authority from the Government; that it was necessary to authorize and control all the public expenditures; and that the appropriation of $47,000 was now asked for, without showing how the large appropriation of last year had been expended, &c. The motion to strike out the section was supported by Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. EDWARDS.

A good deal of discussion took place on the several appropriations moved to be inserted in the bill, for the Military Establishment, &c., and a very active disposition was manifested by the House to scrutinize into the expenditure of former appropriations, and into the necessity of those now called for; as well as to reduce the appropriations to distinct and well defined heads, rather than to make general appropriations for several objects.

The Committee having gone through this bill, took up successively the bill making additional appropriations to defray the expenses of the Army and militia during the late war; and the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy for the year 1817; which underwent the same course of investigation; after which the Committee of the Whole rose, and reported the several bills, as amended, to the House.

The House took up successively these bills, as amended, and after spending considerable time in busily considering the various amendments, and disposing of the same, the bills were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MONDAY, February 17.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" which was read the first time, and ordered to be read a second time to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Captain Teakle Savage, reported a bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Teakle Savage and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McKEE, from the committee appointed on the 24th ultimo, reported a bill repealing the act passed on the 22d day of April 1800, and fixing the command of the corps of marines; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill from the Senate providing for the prompt settlement of public accounts.

Mr. McKEE, from the same committee, also reported a bill repealing the act entitled, "An act for the safe-keeping and accommodation of prisoners of war," passed on the 6th July, 1812; which was read the first time and ordered to be read a second time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. MILLS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by law for regulating the fees of district attorneys of the United States.

INTERNAL DUTIES.

The House then proceeded to consider the proposition, submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS a few days ago, that it is expedient to repeal the internal duties.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I am extremely sorry that the resolution on your table, and those by whom it is supported, should have experienced such unmerited treatment. How long, sir, has it been settled, that the rights and the interests of the American people shall be exclusively confided to the few members of this House who compose its standing committees: or, more peculiarly, to the still smaller number appointed to preside over these committees? Is it presumptuous, or criminal, in any other member of this body, to submit a proposition, which he believes calculated to promote the interest, the prosperity, and the happiness of the nation? Are the laws imposing taxes to remain fixed and unalterable, except by the will and pleasure of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or by the will and pleasure of the chairman of some other important standing committee? Shall no other member dare to propose the repeal of any revenue law, lest he be denounced as a miserable time-serving trimmer, and hunter after popularity? and by gentlemen who are perpetually averring the purity of their own motives; who represent themselves as the disinterested guardians of the interest and happiness of the people; who assure us, that they regard popularity as light as air, and still seem to consider it so delightful to float on the popular wave, that others would be prepared to sacrifice their principles, their integrity, and their honor, in order to catch the delightful breeze, and to float on the current.

I deem it not only the right, but the sacred and indispensable duty of every member of this House, after he shall be satisfied, from a careful, an accurate, and a dispassionate investigation of the state and situation of the funds and resources of the nation, that the proceeds of a particular tax, or system of taxes, are no longer necessary, either to a liberal and honorable compliance with existing contracts and engagements, or to an expenditure suited to the resources and the dignity of the nation, to use his exertions to relieve his constituents from the tax, or system of taxes.

Permit me to inquire whether either of these objects renders a continuance of the internal taxes and duties necessary? I presume that I shall be called on for my system of finance, and be told by some stickler for national honor—by some gentleman who, during this period of sunshine and prosperity, has suddenly become a warm advocate for national integrity and honor, and who, during the war, either forgot that the nation had any honor to preserve, or who, during that period of tempest, utterly disregarded the nation's honor—that it is very common for young politicians to propose the repeal of laws imposing taxes, without considering, or attempting to show, how the proceeds of the taxes can be dispensed with, or the adequate and necessary amount derived from other sources of revenue. Sir, I have not the vanity to submit a scheme of finance; nor is it necessary that I should submit such a system. I beg leave to refer to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, made on the 14th of January, 1817. From these documents, it is not only fairly inferable, but demonstrable, that, for no legitimate object of the Government, either in reference to its existing debts and contracts, or for any necessary expenditure, can it be required to continue this inconvenient, vexatious and oppressive train of internal taxes.

The Secretary of the Treasury presents us, in his annual report, with a scheme of finance for the next four years. By his estimate, after meeting, with good faith, every public engagement, and extending to the public creditors a liberality which they neither merited nor had a right to expect, at the end of the next four years, an excess of revenue, beyond the necessary expenditure, of eight millions four hundred thousand dollars, will remain to the Government, (see annual report, page 13.) This estimate (let it be remembered—I hope it will be recollected by the House) is based on the following principles, viz: the Peace Establishment to remain as fixed by the law of the last session; the Army to be kept up at ten thousand men; the appropriation for the gradual increase of the Navy to continue; and an addition of three millions of dollars to be made to the Sinking Fund; two millions to be permanently added to the Sinking Fund; one million to be paid to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if such payment can be made; leaving a balance, at the end of the year, of $2,000,000 in the Treasury: which additional sum shall be applied to the redemption or purchase of the principal of the debt. It is known, to all who have attended to the subject, that every Secretary of the Treasury, in making an estimate for any given number of years, always estimates the expenditures of the Government at the largest sum authorized, or likely to be authorized, within that period; and estimates the probable receipts during the same period at the smallest possible sum. This is rendered necessary, not only by prudence, but by a proper respect for justice, and a due regard to the peace and tranquillity of the nation. In support of this proposition, I have the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressed in their report of the 14th of January, 1817, and the fact resulting from the report of the late Secretary, Mr. Dallas: in his annual report for the year 1815, he estimated the revenue which would accrue, during the year 1816, from the customs, at $17,000,000. The actual excess in the customs, beyond the estimate of 1815, was $15,000,000; this is proved by the last annual report. Apply this reasoning to the present Secretary's estimate for the next four years. Take the estimate for the year 1818—the customs are, in that year, estimated at $10,000,000; a reduction in that source of revenue of twenty millions of dollars, a sum very nearly double the amount which it is estimated will be received into the Treasury during that year. Is it reasonable, can it be believed, however intemperate the spirit of speculation may have been since the return of peace, that in two years the amount of revenue, derivable from customs, will be reduced from thirty-two to twelve millions of dollars? It is not to be anticipated. The Committee of Ways and Means do not anticipate it. Their report proves most conclusively that they do not. But the Committee of Ways and Means and the Secretary of the Treasury differ materially in their views of the policy of the Government. I am pleased to see this difference of opinion: it is an evidence of independence. Whilst the Secretary of the Treasury considers that it would be unsafe to vest the whole of the surplus revenue of the present year in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund—or, as I presume, to go beyond three millions of dollars, for that is his proposition—the Committee agree to raise the permanent fund from eight to ten millions of dollars; and they propose that, in addition to the permanent and regular appropriation, there should be paid, in the year 1817, to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, the sum of nine millions of dollars, together with four millions to be considered as an advance on account of the regular appropriation of the succeeding year: thus to raise at once, within the present year, the Sinking Fund to twenty-three millions of dollars. Without deciding at all upon the comparative merits of the two plans, I ask if justice or liberality can require the Government to go thus far in the anticipation of its payments: and to whom? To a set of men (with a few exceptions) who, during the late war, took every advantage of the distresses and necessities of the Government, and made loans at the most exorbitant interest.

Internal Duties.

If neither justice nor liberality require the Government thus to anticipate the discharge of the public debt, does true policy dictate the measure? I think not. What portion of the public debt is redeemable at the pleasure of the Government? That portion only which has been subscribed to the Bank of the United States; not made thus redeemable by the terms of the contracts, but rendered so by the charter of the Bank of the United States. It is a condition in the charter, that the funded stock which may be subscribed by individuals to the Bank of the United States is redeemable at the will of the Government. Shall we instantly redeem that portion of the debt? I have no question but that some stockholding member will oppose the immediate redemption of that portion of the public debt, as impolitic, (let it be remembered that the Government is a stockholder,) unjust to the bank, and calculated to depress the sale of the stock abroad. Shall we go into the market on a scheme of speculation, with fifteen or twenty millions of dollars, to purchase up our own debts? What will be the effect? The inevitable result must be, to raise the price of the stock. This would be an entire departure from the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury. He proposes that the purchase shall be made only on the condition that the six per cent. stock can be purchased at par, or the seven per cent. stock can be purchased at six per cent. premium.

But this sum is to be transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, either with the condition that is to be invested in the public stock on the above terms, that is, with the uncertainty of being able to buy up the stock, or they are to go into the market and make the purchase, at any price, which the cupidity of the stockholders may induce them to demand, and this on the idea, that the surplus in the Treasury would otherwise remain unproductive, or yield to the Government no interest.

We are frequently assured that, with the expenditure already determined on, without the aid of the internal duties, the receipts at the Treasury would be inadequate to meet the demands on the Government for the next four years; that the Treasury would be left empty, and without a dollar. This doctrine is pressed upon us by members of the Committee of Ways and Means, particularly by an honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH.)

I know, sir, it is very uninteresting to be engaged in the examination of lengthy documents. But I must again trespass on the time of the House by an examination of the annual report. From this report, to which we all look as furnishing the most correct view of the facts connected with the revenue, it necessarily results, that if we act on the plan proposed by the Secretary, that every demand on the Treasury can be met with good faith, without the aid of the internal duties, and that a surplus will still remain in the Treasury, at least equal to that which he proposes should at all times remain there. Assuming the facts contained in the annual report as data, I beg leave to present to the House a statement in figures of the revenue on the plan of the Secretary.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

The permanent expenditure, including the proposed addition to the Sinking Fund, estimated at - - -	23,500,000
	$5,900,000

Ways and Means for 1819.

Balance in the Treasury on the first day of that year - - -	$5,900,000
Receipts into the Treasury 22,750,000
Deduct internal duties, - - - 2,500,000
Bonus, U. S. Bank, payable this year 500,000
	3,000,000
	19,750,000
	25,650,000
Permanent expenditure, as above stated	23,500,000

According to this estimate, which is made in strict conformity to the plan submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1820, a surplus of revenue would remain of $2,150,000. In this estimate the internal taxes are not deducted for the present year, because it is evident that the repeal of the laws imposing the internal taxes and duties must, in order to be just in its operations, be prospective. Nor has any deduction been made for the three years' interest on the stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States, which, on $7,000,000, at 5 per cent. per annum, would be $1,050,000; because the Government, in the estimate made by the Secretary, received no credit for interest on this stock.

Depart from the plan proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and adopt that recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, in their report of the 14th January, already referred to, and the statement would stand thus:

The receipts into the Treasury, for 1817, including the balance on the first of the year - -	$40,650,000
Deduct expenditures for the present year, including permanent addition of $2,000,000 to the Sinking Fund, which they agree to - - -	24,000,000

Which would leave in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1818, $16,650,000, which would place at the disposition of the Government, within the present year; leaving in the Treasury two millions of dollars, the sum of $14,650,000, in addition to the two millions permanently added to the Sinking Fund, to be applied to the redemption or purchase of the public debt. If the repeal of the laws imposing internal duties take effect from the passage of the repealing act, it would reduce the sum to be thus used in the redemption or purchase of the public debt, within the present year, exclusive of the two millions permanently added to the Sinking Fund, perhaps to $12,000,000. With the only difference that we should consider the advance made in this year on account of the next and succeeding year, as not limited to $4,000,000, as the Committee of Ways and Means have done, but to any portion of the sum beyond the regular appropriation of $10,000,000, which the deficiency in the revenue for those years might require. I anticipate no such deficiency. I am convinced that the customs for 1818 are estimated too low by several millions of dollars. It is evident that on this point the Committee of Ways and Means agree with me.

I have thus pursued the investigation, in reference to the several relations which the subject necessarily presents. I am persuaded that under no view which can be taken of the subject, can a single doubt exist as to the propriety and expediency of repealing the laws imposing internal taxes and duties on the people of the United States. That neither justice to the public creditors, nor true policy on the part of the Government, can require a continuance of those internal taxes and duties.

One other view of the subject remains to be taken. It is said that the system of internal taxes ought to be continued, in order to produce a perfect equality of taxation throughout the United States. The excise law, or the law imposing a tax on distillation, is selected as one of the most desirable character in the whole system, to be continued. It is said to be perfectly equal in its operation. The fallacy of this doctrine will be made obvious by the slightest attention to facts. The improvements made in the art of distillation in modern times, and which can only be introduced into the large establishments, have destroyed everything like equality in the operation of the tax on the distiller. In the year 1798, in consequence of a great scarcity of grain in the Kingdom of Great Britain, in order to prevent the distillation of spirit from grain, an act of Parliament was passed, imposing a tax (I think) of ninety-six pounds sterling a gallon on the capacity of stills, used in the distillation of spirit from grain. This was supposed to amount to a prohibition. Scotch ingenuity very soon discovered the mode of distilling even under this excessively high tax. It was found that by changing the figure of the boiler, so as to expose a much larger surface of the fluid to the immediate action of the heat or flame, that the process would be so quickened as to enable the distiller to continue his operations and to pay the tax to the Government. I do not pretend to be critically versed in the revenue laws of Great Britain; but, if I am correctly informed, the capacity tax under that Government has been very considerably increased since the year 1798, and the distilleries still go on. A patent, within a few years, has been taken out in this country, for a still, which it is said will run off from twenty-five hundred to three thousand gallons a day. Can any man at all conversant in the process of distillation believe that any tax on the capacity of stills can operate equally on the individuals engaged in the distillation of spirit from fruit, who use, and who are compelled to use, the old fashioned globular boilers; and those engaged in the distillation of spirits from grain by the highly improved patent stills?

The people whom I represent have long been engaged in the culture of fruit trees. It requires from eight to ten years for an apple orchard to attain its maturity. All the manure raised on a farm is generally bestowed on the lands employed in the cultivation of orchards. It is known that no crop can be cultivated to advantage on land covered by a full grown orchard. The uncertainty of a crop of fruit in the southeastern part of Virginia, is a melancholy truth, well known to all who reside in that part of the State. During the war, and the continuance of the direct tax, this people were not only highly but doubly taxed on their orchards. A highly cultivated orchard, which bears a proper proportion to the size of a farm, adds very greatly to its value. In the assessment under the law imposing a direct tax, the lands were more highly valued on account of the orchards; they paid then a tax on their orchards in this shape, and in addition a tax on each gallon of spirit distilled. The local militia, in consequence of their vicinity to Norfolk, were exposed and much harassed. They were in the course of one year called out three times en masse. They bore all these privations and hardships without a murmur; they paid the war taxes with pleasure; and, whenever an opportunity offered, they presented their bosoms to the balls and the bayonets of the enemy. They are patriotic—they are attached to their Government. They will at all times be prepared to encounter danger, to meet hardships, and to suffer privations, when the necessities of the Government require the exercise of those virtues. But, sir, they will complain, if a vexatious, inconvenient and oppressive train of internal taxes and duties be continued, when the necessity which required their imposition has ceased.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, entered into an examination of the fiscal part of this question, with a view to show that, if the report of the Committee of Finance on the Sinking Fund should receive the sanction of the House, these taxes could not be dispensed with.

Mr. CANNON, of Tennessee, followed, on the same side of the question, and advocated, as connected with the repeal of the internal taxes, the reduction of the Army, which he considered desirable, independently of the question of reducing the taxes necessary to support it.

Mr. WILLIAMS said it was at the request of a number of gentlemen who were friendly to the subject of the resolution now before the House, and in consequence of what was said by the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. LOWNDES,) that he did not call up the resolution on Saturday last. The chairman of the committee said we might go on with the appropriation bills, and if afterwards the House should determine to abolish the taxes and reduce the Army, the expenditure would be according to that reduction, and not according to the appropriation; for example, if we made appropriations to support an army of ten thousand men, and afterwards reduced the army to five thousand, the expenditure would be in proportion to the five, and not to the ten thousand.

Mr. W. said it had struck him as a very singular fact in our proceedings, that we should be first called upon to make the appropriations, to become, as it were, pledged to a certain amount, and then proceed to ascertain our means to raise the money; and to do that last which ought to have been done first. This, he said, was repugnant to all the maxims of common prudence in private life. No man, when about to build a house or improve a farm, would precipitately execute the object, and then count the cost; but he would, in the first place, examine all his sources of income; he would estimate the probable amount of his revenue, and then proceed to the objects on which that revenue was to be expended. It was for the purpose of changing the order of our proceedings in that particular, that he was anxious to see the tax bills exhibited in the House every year, and acted upon finally, before we had appropriated a single cent to defray even the civil list and contingent charges of Government. Then we could accommodate the appropriation to the money at our command; then, in the words of the old adage, we should cut the coat according to the cloth. But the gentleman from South Carolina had assured the House that if any reduction was made, the expenditure would not be according to the existing establishments, but rather in proportion to whatever reduction of the establishments the House may hereafter think proper to adopt. This assurance, coming from the honorable chairman, had removed his impressions as to the necessity of acting immediately on the resolution submitted by him on Friday. That gentleman, Mr. Speaker, (pointing to Mr. LOWNDES,) at all times and on all occasions, has conducted himself in this House so as to secure not only the confidence and esteem, but I believe the admiration of every member on this floor; but while I pay this just tribute to the merits of that gentleman, I must be allowed to say, that I think he was incorrect when he stated, in reply to the remarks I made on Friday, that I had failed to show any sufficient reasons in support of the resolution then under consideration.

I offered the resolution from a sense of duty to this nation—from a regard to those principles which certainly at one time were deemed orthodox, and upon which the Republicans secured the confidence and support of the people of these United States. In reply to the call made by the gentleman, I stated that the taxes were continued last year on the ground that they were imperiously and absolutely necessary; that it was estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that the whole revenue of 1816, arising from commerce, the direct tax and internal duties, would be something more than twenty-five millions of dollars; that it was more than thirty-eight millions of dollars—making a difference of about thirteen millions between the estimate and the revenue which accrued. Seeing this, I felt justified in stating, that I could not put implicit confidence in the Treasury reports, and that I was unwilling to continue the tax on the people of this country, when it did not appear to be necessary.

Gentlemen now offer the same arguments in favor of continuing the taxes which they urged last year. But as the results of the present year prove, beyond all doubt, that their arguments on the former occasions were fallacious, I therefore contend that they are fallacious now, and deserve no more weight or influence with this House than should have been given to the falsified arguments of last year—falsified, I mean, by the actual results of the present year, and so made known to us by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report.

In connexion with this view of the case, I mentioned, that it was a part of my plan to reduce the Army; that a proposition to this effect was lying on your table, and subject to be called up at any time; that if the taxes were necessary to support an army of ten thousand men, they could not be necessary to support that army, reduced to the number of five thousand.

Having made these statements, and relying on them to support my proposition, I felt that I had sufficiently answered the call of the gentleman from South Carolina. But, sir, I was not bound to show (even thus far) the practicability of dispensing with the taxes; on the contrary, those who are for continuing them must show the impracticability of such dispensation. If any one calls upon me for a debt, my first inquiry is, whether the demand be just; if just, I pay it—if unjust, I refuse payment. In like manner when the people of this country are called upon for taxes, it is incumbent on Government, or on those who speak its language on this floor, to show that the taxes are necessary; if necessary, there is no nation on earth more willing to pay them than the people of the United States. If unnecessary, the people will refuse payment, and they ought to do so. Upon this ground, then, I say the burden of proof lies on the gentleman from South Carolina. Let him show (and no one is more able to do it than himself) that these taxes are necessary, and, my word for it, the people will cheerfully pay them.

The report, sir, of the late Secretary of the Treasury to the President, and the report of the present Secretary, have both gone abroad in the community. From these reports the people expect, nay, demand, a repeal of the taxes. But in addition to all this, the people have the solemn promise of Congress, expressed in the acts of 1813 and 1814, that these acts would continue one year after the war, and no longer. And can it be a fit way to govern this nation, to assure the people, in the solemn form of a legislative act, that taxes would cease to exist one year after the war; and when it appears to be perfectly in your power to comply with the assurance, to refuse it? No, sir, the better way is to comply with your promise immediately, by repealing the taxes. Then we may not only expect, but challenge the confidence and support of our fellow-citizens. I did not expect, when I introduced the resolution, that it would excite unpleasant feelings in the mind of any one. But it appears to have had that effect upon the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) who generally sits near me. That gentleman seems to have a prescriptive right to know and expound the motives of others, when they differ from him in opinion. On many occasions he has intimated that members who differed from him were aiming at popularity! Sir, it was well said by a poet of ancient date, but immortal fame, who satirized the vices of man in the Augustan age, that we were blind as to our own faults, but eagle-eyed as to the fault of others; and were always most apt to condemn others for the very faults to which we ourselves were most liable. In no other way can I account for the propensity of the gentleman always to charge others with aiming at popularity, than by supposing that he measures the conduct of others by the standard which exists in his own breast. I here beg leave to inform the gentleman that if he does not mistake his own temper, he very much mistakes that of others, when he supposes that such reflections will drive them from the position they have taken.

After the subject of the resolution I had introduced was disposed of; after the House had determined to proceed to the orders of the day, the gentleman rises in his place, and gives us a long lecture on economy. Who, sir, could have thought that the gentleman would condescend to use that word, so unfashionable, so unusual in the vocabulary of an independent politician! But the gentleman said he had no view to popularity in pronouncing his lecture on economy, and we are bound to believe it, because he said so. If, however, he had been disposed to mount the hobby-horse which of all others was most fleet and likely to distance the whole turf, he could not designedly have selected a better one for that purpose, than the one on which he happened to be mounted by mere accident.

The gentleman seemed also to complain that the statements produced to support my proposition were not satisfactory. Permit me now, sir, to inform him that I read Treasury reports as he reads the Constitution; that, as he reads the Constitution and interprets it liberally for the purpose of raising and spending money; so I construe liberally the reports of the Treasury, for the purpose of saving money.

The gentleman said he did not read the Constitution with the technical subtleties and refinements of a lawyer, but he read it for the purpose of understanding that it contained a liberal grant of powers to Congress; that the first impressions made on his mind when reading the Constitution with this view were more lasting as well as generally more correct. Shall I not be at liberty, then, to say that the first impression made on my mind when reading the Treasury report was, that we might dispense with the taxes? and nothing has yet occurred to remove that impression. If the gentleman feels justified in obeying first impressions in regard to the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, he certainly will not condemn me for obeying the same impressions in regard to the Treasury report, which are not laws, nor supreme laws, but in many respects mere matters of opinion.

Internal Duties.

The gentleman from Virginia, on the other side of the House, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) likewise complained that the statements offered in support of the proposition were not satisfactory. He said that young politicians might suggest an abolition of taxes, &c., but that those of more experience ought not to sanction such attempts. I admit, sir, that I am a young politician, but while the gentleman from Virginia would condemn me for not being experienced in the virtues of a political life, I trust he will allow me to indulge the consolation of not being very much hackneyed in its vices.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that, on reading the Treasury report, I was convinced we might dispense with the internal taxes. If I failed in the opinion of some gentlemen to show this when the subject was partially debated the other day, no one can now entertain a doubt of it, since the very able and perspicuous view taken of the subject by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JOHNSON,) He has proved to you, sir, that from the Secretary's own statements those taxes are not necessary. What better evidence can we want than the statements proceeding from that department? We know that Treasury estimates are always too low. If these estimates, curtailed and reduced as they always are, do admit the conclusion that the taxes may be removed, shall we not urge it in the discussion? Surely I think it may be urged as the best evidence which the nature of the case will admit. The Government we will say is anxious to keep on the taxes, for reasons which I shall not attempt to expound. The estimates of the Treasury Department are made, if not expressly to insure their continuance, at least with an inclination that way. But the Secretary's own statements, as they were exhibited and declared by the gentleman from Virginia, prove that the taxes may be discontinued. Shall we not then act upon that evidence? Shall we not deem it conclusive of the fact, and repeal the taxes accordingly. I, sir, for one, am determined to support the repeal, and am willing to incur all the responsibility of such a measure.

But gentlemen contend that the taxes may be required some three, four, or half a dozen years hence; and profess an unwillingness to pull down that which it may possibly be necessary to build up hereafter. If, according to the estimates, the taxes may be necessary after the lapse of three, four, or six years, I would, for the purpose of combatting that idea, reply that the estimates are too low; that they fall far short of the amount which will be received, and consequently that no deficiency can be apprehended at the end of that time. The estimates for the last year fell short of thirteen millions of the amount which accrued. Have we not then good reason to suppose that it will be the case again?—that the revenue hereafter to accrue will as much exceed the estimates, as the revenue of 1816 exceeded the estimates of that year? If the late Secretary of the Treasury could not tell with any sort of accuracy the revenue for 1816, I do not know how the present Secretary should determine with precision the revenue which will accrue in any subsequent year. I mean no disparagement to the memory of the late Secretary, when I say that he completely failed in his estimates of the revenue for 1816. For the present Secretary, no one in this House, I am persuaded, has a greater regard than myself; my acquaintance with him convinces me that he is an intelligent, independent, and honorable man. But, as the late Secretary fell short in his estimates, I contend that the gentleman now at the head of that department must also be incorrect; and that he cannot determine with precision the revenue which will hereafter accrue.

Take for example the following:—"The revenue receivable from the customs in the year 1818, (says the Secretary,) will be only twelve millions of dollars!" But the revenue arising from customs in the year 1815, amounted to $36,643,598, and during the three first quarters of 1816, to $30,000,000. Now, sir, by what rule of arithmetic, or series of deterioration is it, that the revenue arising from the same source in 1818, will be only twelve millions? Will not the country increase in wealth and population during that time? Will not the consumption and of course the demand be progressively augmented? I admit that our merchants may have overtraded themselves, and from this circumstance that the importation of goods will not be so great in 1818, as it was during the years 1815 and 1816. But that the defalcation will be so great as to reduce the revenue, in 1818, to twelve millions, I can never admit. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has just said that the estimate of the Treasury for 1818 is too low. The experience of that gentleman, particularly in all subjects relating to commerce and finance, is such, as to justify the House in relying on his statements and opinions; and, notwithstanding his anxiety to continue the taxes, he could not but say that the Secretary's estimate fell short at least by two millions of what would probably be received. Taking all these things into view, I should, as to my own individual opinion, be rather inclined to suppose that it would settle at some intermediate point between $36,643,598, the revenue of 1815, and twelve millions, the estimate of the Secretary for 1818, that is, that between twenty and twenty-five millions will probably be the revenue for 1818.

No one who looks at the accumulating wealth, increasing numbers, rising importance, and growing grandeur of this country, can, I think, be authorized to conclude that the revenue, in 1818, will be reduced to the inconsiderable sum of twelve millions of dollars. The Secretary himself tells you that it is extremely difficult to make any estimate on which reliance can be placed; that in the three first quarters of 1816, the revenue from the customs averaged nine millions a quarter; but that in the last quarter of that year it fell to a third of that average. Upon this minimum of three millions, arising in the last quarter of 1816, I presume he founds his calculations for the year 1818, and says the revenue will be twelve millions. I perceive no other data for the calculation, and I submit it to gentlemen whether it would not have appeared more reasonable, if he had taken, as the basis of it, a medium of the whole amount of the customs for 1816. I think we have as great a right to presume upon a medium for the basis of our calculations, as the Secretary had to presume upon a minimum for the basis of his calculations. Taking, then, for the basis about six millions as the quarter-yearly revenue arising from the customs, it will be found that we shall not, at any future period, want the money arising from the internal duties. If we take four millions for the basis, still the same result follows, that the internal taxes will be unnecessary.

When we see that in one year the estimates of the Treasury have fallen short by thirteen millions, have we not more than probable cause to suspect similar inaccuracies in future? And does not this fact strengthen the view which has been taken in opposition to the Secretary's report? Evidence which fails in one point, may justly be supposed to fail in another. And seeing we were told, last year, that the taxes were necessary, and now find that they were not, it should not be expected that we would concur in opinion either with the Secretary, or with gentlemen on this floor, that the taxes ought to be continued. No, sir, the more I reflect on the subject, the more I hear it discussed in this House, the more I am confirmed in the opinion I first had, that the taxes can be discontinued, and that Congress should immediately adopt measures for that purpose.

Another objection against keeping up internal taxes in time of peace, may be deduced from the form of our Government and the nature of our people. The learned expositors of the Constitution, in the letters signed Publius, have said, that the General Government should not calculate on any considerable revenues from internal taxation. This source may yield supplies in cases of great emergency, but never was intended as a permanent income to the General Government.

In what does a Republican Government, like ours, materially differ from the rotten institutions of Europe, if not in the cheapness with which it is conducted, and the exemption of its citizens from taxation? If a Republic is to be preserved pure and uncontaminated in its principles, let the people never be taxed beyond what is absolutely necessary to the management of their affairs in a cheap, plain, and economical way. Never permit the people to be broken into taxation, as was forcibly said the other day, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) If they should be broken into taxation; if they become oppressed with impositions of this sort, they cannot feel greatly attached to their Government, merely on account of its being called a Republic. If the time, sir, should ever arrive, when the people of the United States are galled with the yoke of taxation; when their high-minded love of freedom shall have been effectually assailed through that means, my word for it, they will be indifferent to any change which may be attempted by the designing. Suppose they were taxed in proportion to their wealth and population, or as excessively as the subjects of European Governments. Could they, I ask, give so unbounded a preference to their own Government over all others as they now do? No, sir, they could not. And, believe me, when I say, that if the citizens of our Republic were as much loaded with taxes as the subjects of other Governments, they would, probably, nay, perhaps, certainly, entertain as little regard for it, as these subjects do for the Governments under which it is their misfortune to live.

But gentlemen contend that we ought to continue the taxes for the sake of the system; that this system operates as a chain to bind the affections of the people to the Government; that when the Government ceases to lay taxes, the people cease to feel the power by which they are protected, and, of course, cease to have reverence and affection for the Government! All of this is repugnant to the plainest dictates of reason and experience. The best way to attach the citizens to the Government is, to keep your hands out of their pockets; to permit them to walk abroad in their own majesty, free from importunity, solicitation, or demand; and upon this point experience speaks with wonted authority. The Administration of Mr. Adams was distinguished for a number of taxes. Mr. Jefferson succeeded him, and abolished those taxes. To which of these Administrations did the people yield their confidence and support? According to the doctrines advanced they must have loved Mr. Adams and his Administration, more than Mr. Jefferson and his Administration, in proportion as they were taxed by the former more than the latter. But the history of those times amply testifies to the contrary. Nothing appears more preposterous than the idea that we must keep on the taxes for the purpose of letting the people know and feel the power by which they are protected. The people will always know you as well, and respect you much more highly, if you do not tease them constantly for a portion of their earnings.

In this system of revenue, we were obliged to employ a host of officers, who live on the vitals of the community, who do not add anything to the productive labor of the country, but fatten on the substance of others. The great, leading, and substantial interest of this country is that of agriculture. This interest, described by an author of no inferior reputation, as the nurse of the human race, the source of health, plenty, and innocent pleasures; the preserver of morals, and the school of the virtues, ought to be encouraged and promoted above all others. But this host of officers, instead of being thus engaged, instead of contributing anything to the wealth of the country, are spending their time in indolence and ease; are growing rich upon the hard earnings and frugal savings of the laborer. Can it be consistent with our interest as a people, but more particularly with our interest as a nation of agriculturists, that these things should be permitted to exist, when not indispensably necessary? For my part I never look at the collectors of internal duties, without emotions which I shall not undertake to describe.

The expense of collecting the internal duties is another item which ought not to escape notice. From the returns which have been made, it appears that the expense of collecting is, to the amount received, as one to ten; that the expense of collecting the customs is, to the amount received, as one to a hundred. Now, sir, would it it not be better to draw our revenue entirely from the customs, which are so much more easy and cheap in the collection, than the internal duties? If, for this purpose, it be necessary to modify the tariff, let us do so. Let us raise the duty on some articles, and lower it on others, so as to produce a greater revenue than we now receive, and equal to any deficiency which may result from the abolition of internal taxes.

Sir, we were called upon the other day to appropriate three thousand dollars as a salary to the Commissioner of the Revenue. He received only this sum when he supervised the collection of seven or eight millions internal revenue. He now also receives that sum for supervising the collection of only two or three millions. This feature in the system of internal taxes is perhaps quite as odious as any other. Mr. Smith, no doubt, is a very faithful and deserving officer; he may be as well entitled to receive three thousand dollars, as any other man would be, under similar circumstances; but, sir, no man who deserves only three thousand dollars for supervising the collection of seven or eight millions, can be entitled to the same salary when he supervises the collection of only two or three millions. The same fact, I imagine, obtains throughout the whole system. You may reduce the amount of tax on the people, but you cannot make a correspondent reduction of salary to the officers; all of them must live.

Some of the taxes I know to be oppressive on the people, and for that reason I should endeavor to repeal them. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) said the taxes were not oppressive; that we had received no petitions requesting a modification or repeal of any of them. Gentlemen urged the other day, in debate, that instructions from the people were not binding on the Representative. If instructions would not be obligatory on gentlemen, I should suppose the people would have a very poor prospect of success, when they presented themselves to this House in the character of humble supplicants. But, sir, it is not necessary that we should receive petitions before we can know that a particular law, or a general system of laws, operates a grievance on the community. Why has the Constitution of the United States declared that the Representatives in Congress shall be inhabitants of the States from which they come? and why is it a law, either statutory or common in the States, that each member shall have his residence in the district he represents? It is for the purpose of enabling each Representative to have an intimate knowledge of the interests, feelings, and wishes of his constituents. By visiting them when he returns home, and by talking with them, he finds out the bearing which any measure may have on their welfare. It is from knowledge, thus acquired, that a true and faithful Representative must act, much more than from petitions. Suppose I were to receive a petition from my district, complaining of the excise, would I be better able to act from the information thus furnished, than from personal conversation with my neighbors and acquaintances during the recess? Sir, I think information acquired in the latter way more entitled to credit, and I should certainly give it the preference, were it to come in conflict with a petition.

But I make these remarks merely to show the gentleman from South Carolina, and others who may think with him, that I do not consider it necessary to be burdened with petitions, before I should feel it a duty to interpose for the relief of those whom I represent in this House. The excise I know to be oppressive, both as to the amount of duty imposed on stills, and as to the inconvenience to which the people are subjected in obtaining a license. In the first place, the tendency of the law is to throw the whole business into the hands of capitalists. The owners of small establishments cannot compete with those who carry on great distilleries; a tax on the gallon would, therefore, be much more equitable than the one which exists on the capacity. It likewise appears to be an extraordinary provision in the law, that, after a distiller has paid for a license, he shall not be at liberty to retail a less quantity of spirits than one gallon. You may rightfully impose a duty on the manufacturing of commodities; but it is extremely rigid to prohibit the citizen from retailing his commodities when manufactured, in whatever quantities he may choose. By this law the owners of small establishments are frequently prevented from raising the money with which to pay the tax on stills. The owner of a cloth factory may be called upon to pay a duty on his machinery, but I imagine it would be thought a strange provision in the law, if he were restrained from selling one, two, or three yards at a time.

The law, as to its object, is unfair and oppressive upon many portions of our country. Distilled spirits are the staple commodity in many parts of the United States; and it does appear to me that Congress have just the same right to tax the tobacco of Virginia, the cotton of South Carolina and Georgia, or the sugar of Louisiana, as the whiskey of any other quarter of the country. The tax operates with peculiar pressure on those parts distantly situated from market, while it is not felt in those near the seaboard. It is, therefore, giving to the latter a great advantage over the former. Such advantages, given by a law to one portion of the community over any other portion, ought to form a sufficient objection to the law itself to produce its repeal.

As to the duty on carriages, on auctions, and stamps, it affects materially but few portions of the State I have the honor in part to represent. Were it only for my individual benefit and accommodation, I should not be very anxious to effect the repeal of those duties. But, sir, if one or two of them be taken off, the revenue arising from the others would scarcely justify a continuance of the system; and as I have no wish to see the rest of the people of the United States loaded with taxes, while my constituents are free from them, I am, for this reason, prepared to vote an entire repeal of the system.

Another reason inducing a wish to repeal the taxes at this time, is, that it would probably make the representative branch of the Government more acceptable in the eyes of the nation than it now is. The best writers on the British Constitution say, that the tendency of that Government is to a concentration of all power in the King. Some gentlemen of great research and profound thought, in our country, have said that the tendency of this Government is to a concentration of all power in the Executive. It, indeed, requires but a partial acquaintance with the history of the present day, to be convinced that the Executive branch of the Government threatens to swallow up all the rest. Gentlemen have admitted, in debate, on this floor, the existence of this fact, with much apparent regret, and have exhorted the House to adopt such measures as would be likely to counteract Presidential influence. It is for this reason, then, that I would repeal the acts imposing internal duties. Let me ask, if the President had recommended the repeal, whether there would be such opposition to the measure as we have witnessed? No, sir. I feel justified in stating, that if the President had advised it, there would be scarcely a dissenting voice. But what would be the consequence of such a measure upon the character and reputation of this House? It would be resounded from one end of the continent to the other by the friends of the Executive, that he deserved all the praise for alleviating the burdens of the people; that his superior foresight, penetration, and love of country, had pointed out that wise and beneficent measure. In this state of the case, the President would have more of the praise and gratitude of the nation than he was entitled to receive, while Congress would be regarded rather as instruments in the hands of the Executive, than as the immediate agents of the people, laboring exclusively for the good of those whom they represented. As a member of this House I would prefer voting for a repeal of the taxes before it was recommended by the President, rather than afterwards; because, if you carry a repeal without, or even against Executive recommendation, you will then come in for a share of that praise which would attach to the President alone, if he had recommended the measure. Not as an individual, then, but as a member of the representative branch of our Government, and anxious to see it raised to that degree of favor which it merits in the estimation of the people, I shall vote for an immediate repeal of the system of internal taxes. It seems to be admitted by some that the taxes cannot exist many years to come. Why not, then, accomplish the work at the present session? Why wait for the President to say, "Repeal the taxes?" Why not rather anticipate him in announcing relief to the people? Gentlemen say that Congress has ceased to be as important and gracious in the eye of the people as it formerly was; that many causes have conspired to depress its character, and to render it less an object of favor than heretofore. It is lamentable, indeed, if this be the fact; but we ourselves are to blame. We have been too much in the habit of waiting for Executive recommendation, before we would presume to adopt any measure which was likely to render us acceptable to the nation; while the odium of every improper or unpopular measure was sure to be levelled against us. Let us, then, at the present session, act a part which becomes us; let us convince the nation and the world that we, the Representatives of the people, are independent of Executive will; that we will pursue the interests of our constituents, even without Presidential recommendation. But, sir, if we adopt a contrary course; if we wait to be dictated to by the Executive; if we suspend our own opinions till his fiat be proclaimed, then we shall realize the condition of which we now only behold the prospect, and to which we see only the tendency, that is, the concentration of all power in the Executive, and the depression of the representative branch of our Government. Miserable, indeed, will be the fate of our country, if the Representatives of the people should, by an improvident use or improper forbearance of the powers with which they are intrusted, bring upon themselves such annihilation.

The last, but not the least reason with me for repealing the taxes, is, that it may become necessary to reduce the Army. For my own part, I think the taxes may be taken off, and the Army permitted to remain at the present number of ten thousand. But I am conscious, that so long as we continue to raise money and vote supplies, there will be no disposition either to practise economy, or curtail any of the expensive establishments which now exist. It is the opinion of some gentlemen that, with the existing Military Establishment, it would be improper to dispense with the taxes. I wish it therefore (by repealing the taxes) to become necessary in the opinion of those gentlemen to reduce the Army. This part of the subject is as important as any which can or will come before Congress at this or any other session. It involves a principle of politics which appeared at one time to be settled, but which now appears again to be in doubt. It is my opinion that the Army ought to be reduced to six thousand; first, because standing armies in time of peace have ever been held dangerous to the liberties of a free people; and, secondly, because of the unnecessary expense to which we are subjected by supporting an army of ten thousand.

Internal Duties.

What, sir, was the language held by our fathers, who achieved the independence of their country, and who, as they knew best how to acquire liberty, also knew best how to maintain it? They universally, when called upon for an opinion, said that standing armies in time of peace were dangerous to the liberties of a free people, and ought not to be allowed. So sacred was this principle, that it was inserted in the constitutions of most, if not all of the States. In the constitution of North Carolina, I know there is a provision to this effect. The same, I believe, will be found in the constitutions of all the States; but, as there are gentlemen present from the several States, they will correct me if I should be wrong. Our forefathers, Mr. Speaker, were not to be scared at shadows—they had braved the direful effects of British vengeance; they had rode in triumph through the storms of war; they had conquered the independence of their country—and it is not to be supposed that they would be so terrified at a mere phantom as to guard against it by the solemn provisions of the Constitution. I speak therefore in the language of wisdom, because it is the language of the sages and heroes of the Revolution, when I say that standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to the liberties of a free people, and ought not to be allowed. In corroboration of this truth, I can refer you to the history of all Governments. What enabled Cæsar to overthrow the Government of Rome, or Cromwell that of England, but a standing army? Or what, in more modern times, enabled Bonaparte to desolate the fairest portion of Europe, but a standing army, and the diffusion of an ardent, restless, military spirit? Sir, if I had no other evidence of this truth than the mere dictum of the sages and heroes of the Revolution, I would yield my assent to it; but, when it comes to us in the shape of a solemn Constitutional provision, and when that provision is strengthened and confirmed by all the evidence which history affords, I should think myself worse than a sceptic to withhold assent.

It has, sir, been well remarked by a writer of great reputation, that man is very much a creature of habit—that he often acts from habit more than reflection. Hence the necessity of forming correct habits, by resorting at first to the dictates of sound reason and dispassionate judgment. It is with governments as with individuals; for governments are operated upon—are put in motion—by the principles of the men who administer them. If standing armies are dangerous to the health and well-being of a government, we should as carefully avoid keeping them in existence, as we should avoid, in our private capacity, the formation of bad habits. If Government should continue a standing army, the alarming tendencies, the frightful consequences, of such an establishment, will at length become familiar to us, and we shall be lulled into security amidst even the most threatening danger. To avoid then a habit of fondness for a standing army, we should always in time of peace bring it down to the minimum of what may be needful. In war we must necessarily have men to combat the enemy, but as soon as war is over we should recollect the maxim transmitted to us by our forefathers; we should consider that in time of peace an army is dangerous, and immediately reduce it as low as the situation and circumstances of the country will permit. I would not be understood to intimate, in the most distant manner, that any of our officers and soldiers at present would endanger the liberties of our country. No, sir, such is not my meaning, and I beg the House not to believe me as conveying the most distant idea of the kind. The present Army has neither the numbers nor the disposition to engage in so unhallowed a work. All I contend for, is this: that the Government and people of the United States should not, in opposition to the advice of our forefathers, acquire a habit of fondness for and dependence upon a standing army; that, to avoid this habit, it should be a settled rule, in time of peace, to reduce the Army as low as the situation of the country will permit; that the question should not be, how many men can we retain in the service, but how many can we dispense with?—that we should not keep in service as many as possible, but as few as possible. Now, sir, I ask whether it is necessary to continue in service an army of ten thousand men? In my judgment, it is not. We want just so many men as will garrison our posts and fortifications. I hold in my hand a statement, from which it will appear that a little upwards of six thousand men will be amply sufficient for this purpose; any greater number involving a risk of contracting that dangerous habit of fondness for a standing army, to which I have alluded. The indulgence of the House will, I trust, be extended to me, while I read the statement: it was furnished by one in whose military knowledge I have the utmost confidence. If gentlemen are not equally disposed to confide in it, they have only to produce other statements, and the candor and intelligence of the House will determine between us.

[Mr. W. then read to the House the number, situation, and names, of our forts and other public works, and the number and description of force necessary to be placed in each, as follows:

Fort Hawkins.—At this fort one company of infantry is necessary, to prevent the white people from intruding on the Indians, and also to preserve the factory established for the purposes of trade.

Town of Savannah.—One company of artillery to keep the fort in repair; the cannon and small arms in order; and also to aid the revenue officers, if occasion should require.

Charleston.—At Charleston there are Fort Moultrie, Fort Johnson, and Castle Pinkney. At these places two companies of artillery will be necessary, for the same purposes as at Savannah.

Fort Johnson, below Wilmington, in North Carolina.—The works at this place are very unimportant, and scarcely merit the attention of a garrison; but, to swell the estimate, we will assign to that fort one company of artillery.

Norfolk.—Fort Nelson and Fort Norfolk are the only works. There may be a water battery on Crane Island, erected during the war, but it is not necessary to garrison it in time of peace. At these works two companies of artillery may be necessary to keep them in repair; to preserve the cannon, small arms, and munitions of war; and occasionally to aid the revenue officers, as at Savannah.

Baltimore—Fort McHenry. One company of artillery, for the same purposes.

Philadelphia—Mud or Sullivan's Fort. One company of artillery, for the same purposes.

New York.—Here there is a fort called Castle William, with two or three other forts, the names of which are not recollected, and which are not material. At these places three companies of artillery would do the ordinary garrison duties, but we will say four.

Newport, Rhode Island.—Fort Trumbull, it is believed, is the name of the works. At this place one company of artillery may be necessary.

Boston.—The name of the works unknown; but, from the extent of them, as generally understood, two companies of artillery will be quite sufficient.

New London, Connecticut—One company of artillery.

Plattsburg.—Rouse's Point, near Plattsburg, is in the neighborhood of Isle de Noix, in Lower Canada; and lest at some unguarded moment the enemy might possibly make a dash upon it, we will assign to this place two companies of artillery and two of infantry.

Sackett's Harbor—one company of artillery.

Niagara—One company of artillery.

Detroit and its dependencies, Mackinaw, Green Bay, and Chicago.—Fort Detroit, three companies of infantry and one company of artillery; Fort Mackinaw, three companies of infantry and a subaltern's command of artillery; Green Bay, two companies of infantry and a subaltern's command of artillery; Chicago, two companies of infantry. It is necessary there should be a larger force at Detroit than the other places, for the purpose of escorting supplies of provisions and munitions of war to Mackinaw, Green Bay, and Chicago.

St. Louis and its dependencies, Fort Edwards, Fort Armstrong, Fort Crawford, Fort Clarke, Fort Osage, and a fort to be established on the Arkansas.—To these places may be assigned ten companies of riflemen and one of artillery, to be disposed of as follows, viz: Fort Edwards, one company of riflemen; Fort Armstrong, two companies of riflemen and a subaltern's command of artillery; Fort Crawford, three companies of riflemen and a subaltern's command of artillery; Fort Clarke, one company of riflemen; Fort Osage, one company of riflemen; the fort to be established on the Arkansas, one company of riflemen; the depot at St. Louis, one company of riflemen;—and the residue of the artillery to keep the stores in readiness, and to escort supplies to the outposts, when necessary.

Fort Washington, on the Potomac—One company of artillery.

New Orleans and dependencies, Fort St. Philip, Fort St. Charles, Fort St. John, Fort Petite Coquille.—Four companies of artillery will be entirely sufficient to garrison these places.

Mobile—Two companies of artillery.

Those little forts in the Creek nation, viz: Fort Jackson, Fort Decatur, Fort Williams, Fort Crawford, &c., are considered unworthy of notice, because the Indians are completely subdued. The country is fast settling, and these places will be of no use.

It may be necessary to establish a fort on the Appalachicola, at or near the Spanish line, where one company of artillery will answer every object the Government can propose.]

The statement exhibited to the House had gone very much into detail, and Mr. W. said he must apologize for having so long occupied the attention of the gentlemen. It appeared to him necessary that a statement of the kind should show the different positions of the garrisons, and the various uses to which they must be applied. If this were done, those not inclined to a reduction of the Army could more easily point out the errors contained in any statements made to the House, and he hoped this consideration would justify him for having consumed so much time by minute details of this part of the subject. It is obvious from this statement that an army containing about six thousand two hundred men will be entirely adequate to every purpose. He must, then, in the seriousness and soberness of the most heartfelt conviction say, that the Army should be reduced; that he would adopt the maxim that standing armies in time of peace were dangerous to liberty, and that no act of his should ever induce the Government to form a habit different from that maxim by continuing in service a greater number than is absolutely wanted. This, he said, is the point to which we should always go, and beyond which we ought never to pass, because the least extravagance in this matter involves the most dangerous consequences.

But gentlemen contend that it would be improper to reduce the Army in the present unsettled state of the world. Sir, I consider their fears on this head as perfectly visionary; for we cannot, I think, entertain apprehensions of another war within any short time. On the Canada frontier, Great Britain is the weaker Power in relation to the United States. She cannot act with such a want of wisdom, with so much precipitation, as to commence war upon us in that quarter. The same remark applies to Spain on our southwestern frontier; in addition to which the state of her South American provinces will be most ample security for her pacific dispositions. It is not likely, therefore, that hostilities will be commenced against us in any part of our territories, so as to make it necessary that we should retain in service more than a Peace Establishment.

There is one other point of view in which this subject ought to be considered, and in which it becomes a matter of good policy, if not of imperative duty, to reduce the Army. It is, that a reduction now will conduce hereafter to the more effectual and substantial defence of the country. I well know that it is invidious to draw comparisons, and I trust not to be understood in what I shall say as meaning the least disparagement to any description of troops during the late war; they all did their duty. But as there are three degrees of comparison, I would ask whether the officers and soldiers enlisted a long time prior to the late war, or those enlisted immediately before the war and during its continuance, won the battles which have done so much honor to the country? Brown and Jackson, and the officers and soldiers who fought under their banners, were not of the old Military Establishment. It is a rule which, I believe, will generally hold good throughout the late war, that the officers and soldiers of the new Establishment contributed most to the defence of their country. The same remark applies to the troops of other nations. When troops have been enlisted just so long as to be perfectly disciplined and no longer, they fight best; after they have become enervated by all the irregularities of a camp life, they are not so much to be depended on. Taking, then, these data, it becomes both a duty and a matter of wise policy, in regard to the future defence of our country, to curtail the Army. Suppose we remain at peace ten years, we have now an Army of ten regiments, costing the Government annually $500,000 each. If we reduce the number to five, we shall in ten years save $25,000,000; if we continue the additional five, we shall in that time expend $25,000,000. These $25,000,000 would keep in service fifty regiments for one year, or twenty-five regiments for two years. Then, by reducing the Army, we shall at the end of ten years be able to employ fifty regiments for one year, or twenty-five regiments for two years. Now, sir, I would ask whether, by reducing the Army, we shall not, at the end of ten years, be better able to defend the country with fifty regiments or with twenty-five, as the case may be, in the manner above stated, than if we do not reduce it, and at the end of ten years have only the ten old regiments, worn out and enfeebled by all the irregularities of a camp life, and in the experience of every country not so much to be relied on? I will not say that my view is exactly correct in all its details, but that the principle of it is true cannot be doubted. Were it, therefore, only for the purpose of saving $25,000,000, and of being thereby better able at the end of ten years to defend the country, I should vote to reduce the Army. But when, in connexion with this view of the case, we reflect on the danger of a standing Army unnecessarily large in time of peace, we should not, in my judgment, hesitate a moment as to the course which ought to be pursued.

But gentlemen say the Army is not greater now than it was in the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, and from thence argue that it ought not to be reduced. It is, sir, a very unsatisfactory mode of defending any measure, to say that something of the kind has existed in times past. Upon that principle, not only the foibles, but the enormities, of almost every Government might be defended. The fact, however, is not as it is alleged to be. Mr. Jefferson's Peace Establishment consisted only of three thousand men, and he got on very well with that number; when an aspect of war suddenly appeared in our horizon, it is true that the number was increased. If in a course of years after the proposed reduction a prospect of war should again appear, we can imitate the example of Mr. Jefferson, and increase the number. A great error has arisen amongst us, from supposing that the maxims of policy in relation to standing armies in Europe are applicable to our situation; whereas directly the contrary is the fact. In Europe, great, powerful, and hostile nations border upon each other; they are always disposed to take an advantage, and often commence wars without permitting their adversaries to have any notice of such designs. But with us, although our Government is composed of separate independent sovereignties, yet they are bound together in one common union of peace and friendship. We are separated from the nations of Europe, the only Powers that can attack us, by an ocean of immense extent; no war can be undertaken against us without giving us reasonable time for preparation. The maxims, therefore, in favor of standing armies in Europe do not apply to the Government of the United States; and the question for us now to decide is not whether the Army was as great during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson as it is at present, but whether it is not now greater than necessary? I have produced statements to support the affirmative of this proposition, and I call upon gentlemen to disprove them. If it can be shown to my satisfaction that the present establishment of ten thousand is necessary to the defence of the country, I pledge you my word, sir, that I will not vote for a reduction. Prove this, and my opposition ceases from that moment. But, believing that the number now in service greatly exceeds that which is necessary, I must persevere in the course I have marked out.

I will now conclude, Mr. Speaker, with remarking to the House, that these observations have been offered not out of any respect I could entertain for the calls made upon me by different gentlemen when this subject was slightly agitated on Friday last. For those calls, sir, I could not possibly feel any respect, and my remarks at present have been submitted to the House from a sense of duty to myself and to the nation, more than from any other consideration. The time has now arrived when, by the vote of this House, we shall determine whether the Government of the United States is hereafter to conform its measures to the characteristic purity, simplicity, and economy of its institutions; or whether we shall go as other nations have gone, and run equally with them the race of taxation and extravagance.

Mr. CALHOUN, of South Carolina, spoke in reply to the gentlemen from Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina, particularly condemning the unseasonableness of the hour at which this question had been introduced into discussion, and showing the improbability of acting conclusively on the subject at the present session.

Mr. HULBERT moved to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. CANNON, SHARP, and HARDIN, and supported by Messrs. ROBERTSON, SHEFFER, SMITH, of Maryland, and LOWNDES, on various grounds and at some length.

Mr. CONNER, of Massachusetts, said that he rose to enter his protest against the reduction of the Army, which had been strenuously insisted upon by his friend from North Carolina, (Mr.

WILLIAMS,) and which he had thought necessary to bear him out in his resolution to repeal the internal taxes. He did not, by any means, see the necessity of the honorable gentleman's interweaving the reduction of the Army with the repeal of the internal duties. For, by his own showing, after the expense of the Army on its present establishment, and all the other expenses of Government, including an additional appropriation of five millions of dollars to the Sinking Fund, have been defrayed, there will remain in the Treasury, at the end of the present year, ten millions of dollars. If the internal taxes were unnecessary, he would vote for their repeal, but he would not vote to reduce the Army.

Mr. C. said he should be brief, for time was becoming every hour more and more precious. A great pressure of important business remained on hand. He regretted that this subject had not been taken up at an earlier period.

After adjusting the important questions of our own compensation, and whether we should or should not turn out our under doorkeeper; after having met the honorable Senate in solemn convention, who chose to withdraw to give us an opportunity to adjust another momentous question, we are now at the very close of the session just commencing business. He had heard the House was not a favorite with the nation, and he feared it never would be until some radical change was effected in our mode of doing business. The unfortunate Army, he said, was neither a favorite with this House or the nation, he believed, notwithstanding its gallant and meritorious services. He believed there never was an Army more gallant, or one that had to struggle with greater privations and difficulties. Every one seemed anxious who should give it the first thrust, as if it were some mighty usurper, and we were Brutus and Cassius, and company. Et tu Brute!—(pointing to General Harrison.) In the first place, it is saddled with immense expenditures that belong exclusively to distinct objects; fortifications, arsenals, ordnance, &c., &c., all are charged to the Army, when in fact they have nothing more to do with the Army, as it regards expense, than with the Navy. Disband your Army, and you do not reduce these expenses. In this, I had almost said insidious manner, the Army is held out to the nation as consuming between six and seven millions of dollars, when in fact it consumes but about three millions. You have recently taken away the pay of brevet officers, which they were entitled to when exercising separate commands, generally the reward of distinguished services; the price of blood, as my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. NELSON) appropriately calls it; you have disbanded veterans without remuneration, who have served their country year after year, and we are now called upon to reduce the establishment, with a view to its ultimate annihilation. Mr. C. said, that if the Army must fall, he had rather see it fall struggling with the enemies of our country, should the "tug of war" again be had, than behold it expire on this floor. He had rather see its bones again whiten the left bank of the Niagara, or the plains of York and Williamsburg, should contest again become necessary at those points. Sir, I have no feelings on this subject but such as a legislator ought to have. If I have any feelings, it is because I have witnessed scenes of havoc and disaster, at which the mind sickens: it is because I know that thousands have unnecessarily been destroyed, and millions unnecessarily expended, for want of that system, organization, military science, discipline, and police, that can alone be acquired and retained by permanent institution. It is true, the enthusiasm of the American character forced victory through all the impediments thrown in our way by the want of this military inurement and service, but it was at the expense of a vast deal of blood and treasure. Reduce an Army of ten thousand men, which has to garrison and defend a frontier of five thousand miles! Why, sir, the proposition carries with it its own refutation. It is totally unnecessary to go into the minute calculation of how many men are necessary to keep the works from falling into ruin, and the arms from rusting, in the chain of fortifications that encircles our immense territory, from Machias to a point five hundred miles up the Missouri. An army is or is not necessary. If it be necessary, ten thousand men is the very minimum of the force that should be assigned to the different points of our immense empire. The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CANNON,) who originally proposed the resolution, should recollect, that although the West cannot be assailed by any foe but such a one as their riflemen are amply competent to cope with, yet that we have ten thousand British troops posted in our immediate neighborhood, and that forty thousand men can be borne hither on the wings of the wind. Sir, what is the use of an army of ten thousand men? It is a nucleus, around which thirty thousand men can be congregated, and who in this manner would attain more military science, discipline, and police; more real efficiency in three months than they otherwise would in three sickly and bloody campaigns, after the Treasury had become bankrupt, and the safety of the country jeopardized. It was by intermixing conscripts with experienced troops that Bonaparte was enabled, as if it were by the stamp of his foot, to bring suddenly such immense and such formidable armies into the field. Mr. C. inquired whether the situation of our foreign relations would admit of the reduction of the Army? Our affairs with Spain were in a very unsettled condition. In addition to a series of injuries, we have received an aggravated, an atrocious insult from Spain, which, if reparation be denied, must be followed by immediate war. So says the President, and so say the people. And if rumors are true, instead of reparation, that Power has recently been making new and urgent demands upon us for immense tracts of territory. Sir, there is no knowing what course that Government will take, the predominant traits in whose character are a blind and ferocious fanaticism and despotism. And there is no foreseeing the complicated chain of consequences which grow out of war when once entered upon. And England, too, sir, unless indeed the bankruptcy and ruin which threatens her, unless the distress of her inhabitants, which swells the note of complaint into the angry tone of indignation and remonstrance, should call her attention at home. And while on this subject, permit me to say, sir, that if I have any political foresight whatever, I think I can discern in that horizon the scuds which immediately precede the tempest—the thunder and lightning of revolution—revolution, sir, which in young Governments is but the fever of the constitution, and frequently succeeded by an increased degree of health—but in old and corrupt ones, death; the profound calm of despotism—the dark ages! Witness France and Spain, where every attempt to meliorate their condition has only sunk them deeper into the abyss. But if I am mistaken in these views of the political situation of England, I certainly am not mistaken in believing that she never will quietly look upon our growing maritime and political power. It is contrary to her nature, her history, her genius, and her ambition. He that reasons otherwise, reasons contrary to nature and experience, and his conclusions must necessarily be erroneous.

Mr. C. said, that he had perused the pamphlet on the colonial policy of Great Britain, which had been alluded to in debate the other day by an honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. WILDE, and he well recollected that Stephen's "War in Disguise," (a pamphlet published at the instance of the British Cabinet,) was the precursor of a system of measures which led to the embargo, and afterwards to war. He was well satisfied that Delenda est Carthago is the prevailing maxim in her Cabinet, and another war with that Power would be one of the most sanguinary character, and decisive of great events. It was not, then, under these circumstances he was willing to reduce the Army. Sir, (said Mr. C.) the honorable Speaker has told us that the Government has been extremely liberal and munificent for military services rendered the country. I grant that in most instances the nation was grateful in its plaudits of our heroes during the war; but there are some instances, at least, that savour of ingratitude. What consolation did Government offer the father of Pike for the death of his immortal son? Why, I will tell you, sir. After having grown gray in the service of his country; after having become disqualified, by age and infirmity, for other pursuits; after having seen his son expire in the arms of glory, at the close of the war he was disbanded, turned out to pick up his crumbs wherever chance or charity might scatter them—turned out, like an old war-horse, upon the common to die! Sir, I am not, at this time, for reducing the Army.

The question was at length decided against laying the resolution on the table—yeas 66, nays 89, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Archer, Baker, Barbour,

Bassett, Bateman, Breckenridge, Brooks, Brown, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Condict, Creighton, Crocheron, Davenport, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hahn, Harrison, Huger, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Kerr of Virginia, Lowndes, William P. Maclay, Marsh, Middleton, Miller, Mills, J. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickering, Pleasants, Robertson, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Schenck, Sheffey, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Stearns, Tallmadge, Taylor of New York, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Townsend, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wendover, Wilde, Wilkin, Thomas Wilson, William Wilson, Woodward, Yancey, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Baylies, Bennett, Betts, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Bryan, Burwell, Cady, Cannon, Carr of Massachusetts, Champion, Cilley, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Clendennin, Comstock, Cook, Cooper, Crawford, Culpeper, Desha, Dickens, Edwards, Fletcher, Goldsborough, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Hardin, Heister, Henderson, Hendricks, Herbert, Hooks, Hungerford, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jackson, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Kont, Kilbourn, King, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Little, Love, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Mason, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Moffitt, Moore, Hugh Nelson, Noyes, Parris, Peter, Piper, Powell, Rice, Roano, Root, Sharp, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tato, Taul, Tyler, Vose, Wallace, Ward of New York, Wheaton, Whiteside, Wilcox, and Williams.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, replied very fully to the arguments of gentlemen who supported this resolution, in principle as well as in detail, vindicated the reports of the Committee of Ways and Means, and showed how inconvenient a moment this was to agitate this question.

Mr. WEBSTER, of New Hampshire, was also opposed to what he termed a wholesale repeal of the internal taxes. He was willing to reduce the expenditures of the Government in any practical way, which was a question, however, that ought to have been settled before the present question was agitated.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, spoke in reply to Mr. LOWNDES and others, taking occasion to express his regret that the question of a reduction of the Army had been connected in the debate with this proposition, with which in his view it was wholly unconnected in fact.

Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, spoke at considerable length and with much earnestness in opposition to the passage of the resolution on various grounds.

The question was loudly called for, it being about 4 o'clock, and the House refused a motion to adjourn.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the resolution, in order to save future trouble, and make it more specific, so as to specify the repeal of each of the internal taxes distinctly. [This will bring before the House separately the question of repealing each tax.]

Mr. INGHAM's motion was as follows:

Resolved, That the duty on carriages and harness be repealed.

H. OF R.

Internal Duties.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

Resolved, That the duty on auctions be repealed.

Resolved, That the duty on stamps be repealed.

Resolved, That the duty on licenses to retailers be repealed.

Resolved, That the duty on refined sugar be repealed.

After some conversation, arising from the new shape now given to the proposition, a motion to adjourn prevailed by a small majority, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 18.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom an inquiry on the subject had been referred, reported that it is inexpedient to multiply the newspapers in which the acts of Congress are published. This report was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, reported a bill providing an additional compensation to the circuit judge of the sixth circuit; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. SHARP, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Madame Renaut Maynaud de Pancemont, and her husband François Maynaud de Pancemont, by their agent Philip Mercier, which report was read; when Mr. S. reported a bill confirming certain lands in the Territory of Illinois to the heirs of Philip Renaut; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Gabriel Winter.

Mr. CONDUCT, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made a report containing estimates of expenses to be incurred in re-erecting the public edifices; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported on a bill freeing from postage all letters and packets to and from James Madison; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time tomorrow.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House a letter from the Governor of New Hampshire, informing him that he had transmitted through the collector of the customs for the port of Portsmouth, a map of the State of New Hampshire, for the use of this House.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Committee on Foreign Relations were instructed to report to this House such measures as they may judge necessary to regulate the importation of plaster of Paris, and to countervail the regulations of any other nation, injurious to our own, relating to that trade.

INTERNAL DUTIES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. WILLIAMS, to repeal the internal duties; when the question recurred on Mr. INGHAM'S proposed amendment.

Mr. ROOT moved to amend the amendment so as to confine the repeal of the duty on carriages, to those "not exceeding one hundred dollars in value;" and spoke at some length in support of his proposition.

Mr. BATEMAN, of New Jersey, moved an indefinite postponement of the whole subject; he was convinced that this was the course it ought to take. I have great doubts, said Mr. B., of the expediency of abolishing the internal duties at this time; still more do I doubt the practicability of effecting it this session, now so near a close. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be done without waiving the decision on many important matters, which have been long on your table.

We have lately passed through an expensive war, which has had the unavoidable effect of materially increasing the amount of the national debt. The people are desirous of paying it off. If any one sentiment is more predominant among them than any other, it is, in my opinion, a desire that you would adopt measures for as rapid an extinguishment of that debt as possible, without too much oppressing them with inconvenient taxes. Sir, said Mr. B., there is a bill on your table for the redemption of the public debt, proposing to increase the Sinking Fund, which I wish to see passed into a law. This bill, were the great body of the American people congregated in democratic town-meeting, and they authorized, would be voted for, I verily believe, by a large majority, perhaps nine-tenths. All my intercourse with them has tended to confirm this opinion. For the purpose of discharging this debt, and defraying the current expenses of the Government, large sums must for some time to come, be drawn from the people. Taxes, in order to be just, ought to be equal; and in order that they may be so, it is indispensable that you diversify the objects of taxation. When, therefore, large sums are to be raised, does it not seem necessary, is it not just, that a portion of it should be derived from internal sources? Besides, these internal duties form part of a system of revenue adopted, like the Constitution under which we live, from a spirit of compromise; some of them may operate more severely on particular districts, whilst others will be principally felt on other sections of the country. Upon the whole, perhaps the operation is as fair and unexceptionable as could reasonably be expected.

Will it be safe, asked Mr. B., to trust altogether to imposts? I am aware, said he, that all calculations relative to expenditures or receipts of the Government, for a series of years to come, must be, in a great degree, conjectural. If we must err, however, I think it best to err on the safe side; to estimate the probable receipts too low rather than too high. I have neither the inclination or ability to go into a minute examination of the accuracy of the reports on this subject. But what is the probability? Our receipts from external sources must be greatly lessened; it is impossible that it should be otherwise. What, Mr. Speaker, is the situation of the country since the conclusion of the peace? Our imports have exceeded our exports to an alarming amount. This country is indebted to European merchants for the very goods now in our market, for many already consumed ; and wherein consists our ability to pay for them ? It is true that the amount in value of the exports of the last year has exceeded expectation. This, however, as the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) informs us, is owing more to the high price of the articles exported than to the quantity of those articles. Will these high prices continue ? What is the state of Europe ? The mighty convulsions which have so long agitated that quarter of the world, have at length settled down in the calm of despotism. It is not probable that new wars of great extent will again soon occur ; the wretched state of their finances forbids it. They have many men unemployed, and the general scarcity of breadstuffs there, as well as here, will have the effect of turning the general attention to agriculture ; and should two or three favorable seasons occur, the amount of the products of the soil will be unusually abundant. The time is near at hand when this will be likely to be the case. In such an event they will require but little of our surplus produce ; and if they receive it at all, it must be at greatly diminished prices ; thus continuing our inability to pay for a large quantity of articles subject to duty. Then, indeed, will the cultivators of our soil perceive the importance of a home market—such a market as an efficient protection of our manufacturing interest cannot fail to create.

Internal Duties.

H. of R.

This being my view of the matter, said Mr. B., I question the prudence of abolishing these taxes now, when it is more than possible that we may be under the necessity of re-enacting them, even should we remain in a state of peace,

With respect to the pledge spoken of, that the taxes should not continue longer than one year after the termination of the war, I will only add, in addition to the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who, I think, has fully answered the objection urged on that ground, that if a pledge was given, which, strictly speaking, is denied, the obligation must be very feeble ; no contract was entered into, no concessions made by the people, inasmuch as Congress had the express right by the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, to lay and collect taxes.

I would inquire, said Mr. B., of the advocates of this resolution, when they propose that the repeal should take effect ? If immediate, or in the course of the ensuing Spring or Summer, then the relief contemplated to be afforded by it will be very unequally felt. The carriage-holders and a large proportion of the retailers have already paid for the full term of the current year. The greatest share of the benefit would of course fall to the lot of the distillers, a class of citizens last of all perhaps that ought to be relieved, especially in these times of calamitous scarcity. The duties on foreign distilled spirits it will be recollected are very high, fixed so with express reference to the distillers. If, therefore, you abolish this tax, you virtually grant an extravagant bounty to these citizens, a bounty not granted to manufacturers of other articles, much more important to the general welfare.

But if, as some have suggested, the repealing laws should not go into operation until the close of the year, then why press the subject now ? why not refer it to the next Congress ? They will convene at the commencement of December, and will have ample time for considering it. Ours is too precious to be needlessly expended. One week is of more importance now, than a month will be then. Mr. Speaker, said Mr. B., I do most sincerely regret the introduction of the resolution at this late hour. It is scarcely possible that any practicable good can result from it. There is not, as I before observed, sufficient time to act upon it ; being a subject involving necessarily a general examination into the state of the Union, and an inquiry into our financial prospects, both now, and when the resolution is cut up in detail, much debate must be expected. Mr. Speaker, at the last session you abolished many of the internal taxes ; you reduced others. It was not contemplated, I understand, by the Committee of Ways and Means, to ask for a renewal of the direct tax ; with this the people would be satisfied ; they do not complain. Let us wait one year longer, at least, before we adopt a measure, which, if its advocates should happen to be mistaken in their calculations, may involve us in difficulty.

In two weeks, continued Mr. B., the Fourteenth Congress will be no more. Our functions as members will have ceased ; we shall have separated. All experience proves that the last days of a session are peculiarly unfavorable to deliberate and judicious decisions. It was calculated, on another occasion, that we are, upon an average, four hundred miles from home. Our thoughts will soon be forcibly directed to our families and firesides ; we shall be employed in settling our accounts—in closing our laborious business at the public offices—in packing up and preparing for our journey ; and it will be found difficult to concentrate sufficient attention to the public business. Where is the labor of the numerous committees of this House during the Winter ? Are not the fruits of a large proportion of it on your table, in the shape of bills and reports, as yet, unacted upon ? Can we, then, too soon dispose of this subject, and proceed, in good earnest, to a consideration of the many items of important business to be found there, before we separate ?

Mr. B. concluded, by expressing a hope, that, notwithstanding the state of the vote of yesterday, on the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, that the House would be induced, upon further reflection, to consent to his motion, indefinitely to postpone the original resolution, and the proposed amendments thereto.

Mr. HARRISON also insisted on the propriety of postponement, chiefly on the ground of the impolicy of reducing the Army, which proposition had been considered as connected with that now under consideration.

Mr. HARDIN spoke against the postponement, endeavoring to convince the House that these taxes might be repealed without a reduction of the Army, but in favor of reducing the Army if necessary to authorize a repeal of the internal taxes.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

Mr. WILDE spoke at considerable length in opposition to the proposed repeal, argumentatively, and on various grounds.

Mr. ROOT and Mr. ROBERTSON next spoke in favor of a repeal of the taxes; the former in favor of the immediate repeal, and the latter in favor of a repeal prospectively.

Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. LOWNDES, in short speeches, supported the motion to postpone the subject indefinitely.

Mr. KILBOURN spoke twice against the postponement, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in favor of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, and Mr. RANDOLPH, also spoke in favor of the repeal of the taxes; and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, again spoke in favor of the postponement.

The question was at length taken on indefinite postponement, and decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 94, as follows:

The question then recurred on Mr. Root's proposed amendment, which he then withdrew.

The question was then taken on Mr. INGHAM's motion and decided in the negative.

The question having been stated on the original resolution proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS, a division of the question was called for—and before taking the question thereon, the House adjourned at a late hour.

WEDNESDAY, February 19.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed by a resolution on the 7th ultimo to inquire into the expediency of directing the application of the funds arising under the acts of Congress for the relief of sick and disabled seamen at the port of Richmond, in aid of the funds of the corporation of that city, towards the erection and support of a marine hospital, made a report thereon; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill concerning the compensation of the district attorney for the district of Massachusetts; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill supplementary to the act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, was read the second time and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON,

The House proceeded to consider the proposition to amend the rules and orders of the House submitted by him on the 8th instant, and the same being amended, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the several Committees on Public Expenditures to inquire whether any offices belonging to the branches or departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary, and to report from time to time on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also, to examine into the pay and emoluments of all offices under the laws of the United States; and to report from time to time such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require."

The House, then, on motion of Mr. JACKSON, proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims unfavorable to the petition of Allen McLane. Mr. J. moved to reverse the report; which motion he supported with much zeal. His motion was as decidedly opposed by Mr. CHAPPELL and others, and finally negatived. The report of the committee was then concurred in.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles: "An act respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor;" and "An act to provide for reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court," in which they request the concurrence of this House.

INTERNAL DUTIES.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, for the repeal of the internal duties.

An appeal was asked by Mr. WILLIAMS on the Speaker's decision that this motion was susceptible of division; but he withdrew the motion in consequence of some observations by Mr. RANDOLPH.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, the resolution was amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the several acts imposing internal duties be repealed, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to report a bill for that purpose.

The question was then stated to agree to the resolution as amended; when Mr. SHEFFEY moved further to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "Resolved," these words: "That the Army of the United States be reduced to six thousand men."

Mr. WEBSTER spoke at large against a general repeal of the internal duties, on general principles, particularly on comparing them with duties on articles imported, some of which, he contended, particularly those on salt, sugar, and coffee, were much more grievous impositions on the people than the internal duties. Mr. W. spent some time in examining the bearings of the various taxes on different interests of the Government, deducing the inference that the navigating was the interest most severely taxed at present.

Mr. ALEXANDER expressed his decided opinion in favor of a repeal of the taxes; but said he did not wish to give a vote which, from the course the business and debate was taking, would be a pretension merely to do that which he was convinced could not be consummated at the present session.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained his views as being in favor of a repeal, if the report in favor of a large sinking fund should not be agreed to; but opposed to it if that proposition should succeed.

Mr. SHEFFEY spoke in favor of a reduction of the Army, and expressed his willingness, if the Army should be reduced, to vote for a repeal of the internal duties, but not on any other ground. He was, under present circumstances, opposed to the repeal, and condemned the precipitancy with which the House had appeared to pass at once from excess to parsimony.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke in explanation and in reply to Mr. SHEFFEY.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, also spoke in explanation and reply.

Mr. SHEFFEY replied to the remarks of the two latter gentlemen.

Mr. RANDOLPH rejoined, and at some length maintained his opinions.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, next took the floor, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Oppressed by sickness, I scarcely dare venture to ask your indulgence and the attention of the House to a few hasty remarks on this momentous subject. Permit me first to congratulate the Administration of my country on the accession of numbers, strength, and eloquence, from among those with whom it has been my pride and my pleasure generally to act; whether their adoration is directed to the setting or rising sun, a few days will determine. Though I congratulate the Administration, I do most deeply lament the loss which the people of this country must suffer. The people, did I say! It is almost treason to name them on this floor; methinks I behold, in the countenances of many aspiring spirits, the smile of scorn, and sneer of contempt: beings who affect an independence of public sentiment and public feeling. Yes, sir, the people are wounded, cruelly wounded, in the house of those who ought to be their friends—their representatives. Sir, I am soon to return, and with a heart overflowing with gratitude to my Almighty Father, I render to him the homage of that heart for the blessing! I am soon to return to that people to be one of them. Yes, sir, in times and scenes like these, to that true post of honor—a private station.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) with reference to the repeal of these taxes, says, that the people have not petitioned, have not complained, have not remonstrated. Petitioned, whom? in the name of God! Their representatives, knowing their wants, knowing their interests, and sent here expressly to relieve the one and promote the other? What does the honorable gentleman expect? What does he wish? That the great body of the American people should approach him—this House, bowing the head and bending the knee, and, as in duty bound, ever pray? Sir, if they could for a moment thus degrade themselves, they ought not only to be taxed, but to be the slaves of tax gatherers forever. Petition whom, I again demand? The constituent bend to the representative? the representative not know the wishes, the feelings, the distresses, of the people? Sir, they are much more likely to approach you, going on as you are, with sharp complaints and fierce remonstrance. Their interests are not attended to, their sentiments are not consulted. I have had occasion before to remark, I now repeat it—the people of this country stand first in the Constitution—we the people—and the last to receive any benefit from it. When you want money, you tax the people, without reason or mercy. When your follies or your faults have driven you into war, you call upon the people to fight your battles; and, if the cruelty of your petty officers or their own sufferings compel them to desert, you shoot them by dozens. But when a resolution is prepared to relieve them from numerous oppressive taxes, and hosts of greedy tax gatherers, or a law to aid the unfortunate and set the prisoner free, then you know not the people; you hear not their complaints; you heed not their distresses. Sir, they are not that tame, that patient animal, which some believe them. They may turn upon you in despair; tempt them not too far.

In De Witt's Interest of Holland, the people are compared to generous and mettlesome horses, which arbitrary rulers attempt to break with the bit and bridle; meaning taxes and obedience. Our rulers have gone further; unto the bit and bridle, supposing them broken down, they have added the spurs; I mean ten thousand bayonets—their standing army, to urge the unfortunate creatures forward.* The same honorable gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) further calls this an idle debate; that it will lead to no beneficial result—not time, &c. If the honorable gentleman considers this an idle debate, how will he characterize that, on his bonus bill,† as it is called, which goes to appropriate eight or ten millions of the people's money, to his magnificent schemes, as he and his friends consider them, of internal improvement; grand canals; splendid military roads; besides many castles in the air. Schemes, "like the glare of false science that leads to bewilder, and dazzles to blind." There was no want of time then, when the object was to squander millions of the people's money; day after day was then spent in worse than idle debate, on objects worse than useless; but now, when the people are to be relieved, burdensome taxes to be removed, we have not time; go thy way for this time; more important objects must engage our attentions. What can be more important than the interest, the welfare, of the whole American people? Sir, the claims of no individual, of no number of individuals, are to be put in competition with the claims, the interest of the whole. Sir, this is the very time to attend to the repeal of these laws. All the important reports from the departments, and from committees, are before the House, with all the public measures proposed for adoption; we have now a view of the whole ground, we can and ought to decide promptly and without delay.

The honorable gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WEBSTER) contends that the repeal of the internal duties will destroy the equality of our taxation; for this purpose he views our customs and internal taxes as one great system. Now, sir, it is well known they have no connexion whatever; they are separate and distinct; adopted at different times, and for different objects—and the right of the United States to tax some of the objects of present internal taxation, is doubted by many; that on State banks, for instance, incorporated by State sovereignties, and taxed by them. The United States might destroy these State institutions, by heavy impositions, and make their own mammoth bank swallow them up. But, sir, their internal taxes find but little, if any, to keep up this equality; not enough, indeed, to burden our own constituents for the pleasure of keeping a little heavier burden on our neighbors. It is no alleviation of my taxes, that my neighbors pay more; though, indeed, it is very questionable poverish the subject, that they may assume to themselves what power they please; they therefore take special care that their subjects may not be like generous and mettlesome horses, which, when they cannot be commanded by the rider, but are too headstrong, wanton, and powerful for their masters, they reduce, and keep so tame and manageable, as not to refuse the bit and bridle, I mean taxes and obedience."—De Witt.

† This stock-jobbing Latin word, bonus, actually occurs in the title and body of that bill. In the House, a motion was made to strike it out, but negatived. No wonder, said a worthy friend from Connecticut, it is the only good thing in the bill.—Note by Mr. K.

whether these internal taxes do tend to preserve the equality of the system. The returns will show that the Atlantic States pay as great a proportion of the internal taxes, as the Western do; say that the Atlantic States pay two-thirds of the customs (as consumers I mean) shall we to that burden add half the internal taxes for the sake of making the Western States pay the other half? considering, too, how much better able they are, in the South and West, to pay their taxes, than the people in the North and East. The honorable gentleman is extremely anxious that the people of the West should continue to pay the tax on whiskey, because we pay a high duty on imported spirits, and on account of its beneficial effect upon the community. But, sir, are not our foreign spirits to be considered as luxuries, and of the worst kind too? Is it not right we should pay for them? If we could content ourselves with whiskey, or even New England rum, would they not come much cheaper to us, and in this way equalize the duties? As to the moral effect upon the country, I do extremely doubt whether a tax on ardent spirits makes one drunkard less. Nay, sir, greater distress is introduced into poor families, when spirits are high, for it is a poison they will have, by diverting more of their small gains from their families to this pernicious object. But, sir, revenue was the object of the Government, not reformation of morals. And are all these internal taxes to be retained? Are all the sober and virtuous to be severely taxed for the hopeless purpose of reforming a few intemperate wretches? I have no objection to your taxing the vices, though I have to your taxing the virtues of the people. The honorable gentleman wishes the duties on many articles of import reduced. I unite with him; but what connexion has that with the repeal of the laws? He says we consume more coffee, tea, and sugar, than the West, consequently pay more duties thereon. Granted; we have more luxuries, necessities, if you please; but are not the people of the West taxed severely in the price of the same articles, when used? When not obtained, do not they suffer inconveniences? The gentleman too thinks the tax on salt extremely high, and that it ought to be repealed—that the West manufacture for themselves, and the Atlantic States pay almost the whole duty. But does not our salt, even with the duty, come cheaper to us than their salt to them? It costs them nearly twice as much as our salt does us. But the honorable gentleman is peculiarly unfortunate in the selection of the duty on salt. Does he not know that a great part of the imported salt with us is consumed in the fisheries, and that the bounty on pickled fish, and allowance to certain vessels employed in the fisheries, are fair equivalents for the duty on the salt used in that business? Does he not recollect likewise that we have extensive salt works in New England, encouraged and protected by this duty? Sir, I much doubt the expediency of repealing the salt tax. The honorable gentleman says further, that he is against this wholesale mode of legislation, as he is pleased to call it.

FEBRUARY, 1817.

Internal Duties.

H. of R.

Sir, were not these taxes put on the people by wholesale? The honorable gentleman now proposes that we should act upon them singly, that is, he retails them out to us. Sir, I will take them by wholesale and retail, from the hands of the Government and the backs of the people. The honorable gentleman says our commerce and navigation are crippled, many of our merchants bankrupt, and our poor destitute of bread; and yet we will not repeal these taxes—nay, he yesterday voted to postpone indefinitely this resolution to repeal them; how will he answer this to his constituents? How to New England? burdened and oppressed as they are. If gentlemen are not pleased with our climate, variable and severe as it is, yet congenial to feelings there nourished; if gentlemen are not satisfied with our soil, rough and barren as much of it is, yet pleasant to the eye which there first wept; if they are not content with our country, bleak and mountainous as it is, yet dear to the heart which there first beat, let them seek a better country—yes, sir, even a heavenly one, to which, Father in Heaven, conduct all thy children!

But, sir, we stand pledged to the American people to repeal these taxes; it is a mere temporary system, and so considered in the report of the committee which recommended their imposition; it was during war, when other sources of revenue failed, "for defraying the expenses of Government and maintaining the public credit," during that disastrous period; and a limitation of all the acts was established at their passage, otherwise you would not have dared burden the people with them. We heard nothing then about this as a system to be perpetually persevered in to equalize that system, for to that length the arguments of gentlemen go. To each of the acts imposing duties—first, on refined sugar; second, on carriages and harness; third, on licenses to distillers; fourth, on sales at auction of merchandise and of ships and vessels; (to be of ships and vessels, which you can now scarce give away!) fifth, stamps on bank notes and bills of exchange; and sixth, on licenses to retailers of wines, &c., and merchandise; (what more unequal? the same tax on a petty retailer with a capital of one thousand dollars, and the wealthy merchant with a capital of fifty thousand; and the consumer, on account of this tax, paying, in the additional price of the commodities, four times the tax!)—I repeat, that to each of these acts, all passed in 1813, was added this, as a concluding section—"And be it further enacted, That 'this act shall continue in force until the termination of the war in which the United States 'are now engaged with Great Britain and Ireland, 'and their dependencies, and for one year thereafter, and no longer,'" that is, until the 17th February 1816. Still, in violation of all your engagements, and of this solemn assurance to the American people, they are continued to this day, and are now advocated and defended as a system. See, too, sir, the art and address with which this system is brought forward. Moderate internal taxes are first imposed, on the ground of extreme necessity, with a solemn assurance they should cease in one year after the war. They next greatly increase nearly all those laws—some more than double; and then, before they expire, supposing the people well broke to the bit, they re-enact them all, without limitation. What yesterday was but innovation, is now defended as a system. If the people of this country can, for a moment, tamely acquiesce in such a breach of the public faith—in such daring encroachments on their rights and interests, even the little standing army which we now have on foot, will not be necessary to deprive them of their remaining rights and privileges.

Of that army, sir, which has been introduced into this debate, I shall say nothing. I have no enmity against the profession—I honor the honorable part of it, whether it be the skilful and gallant officer that plans, and commands, and leads, or the firm, the brave yeoman, that suffers, that fights, that bleeds, for his country, or gloriously falls in her defence. But place not your dependence on a standing army; the very name is ominous to liberty—for though your ten thousand bayonets may not be able to murder all our citizens, or destroy their liberty, still those who handle and direct them, may eat us up! The expense of your Military Establishment is enormous—more than six millions of dollars annually, according to your present appropriations. The blessed volume informs us, that the horse leech has two daughters, crying—give—give! so does your army; there is no satisfying it. Sir, with our virtuous ancestors, I believe a standing army, in time of peace, unnecessary and dangerous. Yours ought to, and I hope will be reduced. It causes you to neglect your militia; yet, they are the true and safe defence of free nations. Yes, these are the breastworks on which you must rely, in the hour of peril—in the tug of war. 'Tis the owners of the soil, who must defend it against all invaders.

Gentlemen on the same side, who have preceded me in this debate, have clearly demonstrated that the amount of these internal taxes is not wanted to defray your ordinary expenses, extravagant as they are, nor to maintain your public credit. The net estimated amount of these taxes, for four years to come, is $2,500,000 annually. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report on the state of the finances, states an excess of receipts into the Treasury, in 1816, beyond the estimate of expense for that year, of $13,500,000; he estimates the permanent annual revenue of the year 1820, at $24,250,000; putting the customs at $18,000,000, the permanent annual expenditure, until the public debt is redeemed (including an addition of $3,000,000 to the present Sinking Fund of $8,000,000, and for the military service $6,459,625, annually,) is placed at $23,500,000; and calculating on this extravagant plan of expenditure, he says there will be "an excess of revenue, beyond the estimated expenditure during the next four years, of $8,400,000;" for what purposes? Turn over a new leaf in the Secretary's book, and see—"Applicable to such objects of internal improvement, or national defence, as the wisdom of Congress may direct." Yes, sir, this is the order of the day: Grand canals—splendid military roads—magnificent public edifices—waste and profusion in most of your expenditures, and many of your people in rags. Now, sir, if, instead of adding three millions to the Sinking Fund, you add but two, at the end of the next four years there will be in the Treasury $12,400,000; but your internal taxes for the four years, amount only to $10,000,000. Repeal the taxes now, and there will be in the Treasury, at the end of said four years, $2,400,000; after that, should the estimates of the Secretary be found correct, you can add but one million to your Sinking Fund of eight million; making your annual expenditure $21,500,000; and, after the repeal of the internal taxes, your annual revenue $21,750,000—excess of the latter, $250,000, with a balance of $2,400,000 in the Treasury. These calculations are consistent with all your public engagements. It is wrong—'tis oppressive, to keep these burdens upon the people, just escaped from the hardships and calamities of war. If you ease them of their burdens now, they will be better able to bear them, should the future necessities of the country, which God forbid! demand them.

Sir, this question goes further in its consequences, than to relieve the people of their grievous burdens; the great struggle must here be made—must here be decided; would to God it could now be decided successfully! whether true economy and severe retrenchment shall take place in your Government, or waste, extravagance, and profusion, continue in all your departments. This is the true and great point in contest; turn as you will, this is the real question now to be determined. I deem it of the last importance to the welfare of my country, and the prosperity of its citizens. Gentlemen favorable to this resolution, should permit nothing to divert them from their object; let the efforts of our opponents to distract but unite us the more—march steadily and firmly forward to its accomplishment—give neither sleep to your eyes nor slumber to your eye-lids until your efforts are crowned with success. If a sitting of five hours be not sufficient, sit ten—nay, fifteen, rather than fail. Feeble as my health now is, for the accomplishment of this great, this national object, I would not only sit here during that time, but till the bright and the morning star should dawn on my country.

THURSDAY, February 20.

Mr. THOMAS WILSON presented a petition of sundry members of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, praying that a district and circuit court of the United States may be established at the city of Pittsburg, in that State.—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to authorize the extension of the Columbian turnpike road within the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting the information required by the resolution of the 15th instant, relative to a mutiny in the late 38th regiment of infantry; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting information relative to the claims of the State of Massachusetts, for payment of the expenses of the militia ordered out by the Executive authority of that State during the late war; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. GOLDBOROUGH,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what measures may be necessary to be adopted in consequence of the great failure of the corn crop in the past year.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be reported to the next session of Congress such measures as he may deem most effectual for the security of the country watered by the Chesapeake Bay and its tributary streams, against the maritime force of an enemy.

SUBSCRIPTION TO CANAL STOCK.

Mr. THOMAS WILSON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, made a further report, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe in behalf of the United States, for shares in the capital stock of certain canal companies therein mentioned; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred, on the 4th of December last, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to roads and canals, having heretofore made report, in part, and having had the subject under further consideration, ask leave to report a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for shares in the capital stock of certain canal companies therein mentioned, to wit: the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, and the company incorporated by the States of Virginia and North Carolina for opening a canal through the Dismal Swamp, from Deep creek, a branch of Elizabeth river, which runs into the Chesapeake bay, in Virginia, and Joyce's creek, a branch of Pasquotank river, which runs into Albemarle sound, in North Carolina.

The facts and reasoning which have governed the committee with respect to the first mentioned canal are set forth in the memorial and petition of the president, directors, and company, referred to your committee on the 10th day of January last; and the facts and reasoning which have governed the committee with respect to the last mentioned canal are set forth in the survey and written description reported by Major Kearney, topographical engineer, and communicated by the Acting Secretary of War to your committee, in answer to an inquiry made on behalf of the committee of that department; which written descrip-

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the subscribers, Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, on behalf of that company, respectfully sheweth, that the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company have, at several times heretofore, presented memorials to Congress praying for its aid.

In these memorials the most ample information was given of the importance of the canal, its practicability, and the measures taken to carry it into effect. Referring to them, your memorialists feel it unnecessary to swell this application with a repetition of facts often set forth, and universally acknowledged; they confine themselves, therefore, at present, to lay before Congress such prominent features in their case as the occasion demands.

It is well known that after the importance of opening the communication between the Chesapeake and Delaware had excited the attention of the most intelligent men of the country for more than half a century, it was begun with enthusiasm, and successfully prosecuted for more than two years; during which all the preliminary operations were completed, and considerable progress made in cutting the canal itself; but at the expiration of this time it became absolutely necessary to suspend it, from no other cause than the failure of funds, arising from the neglect of the stockholders to pay up their subscriptions.

The causes of this neglect were fully explained to Congress; they were, in fact, no other than that in a country where moneyed capital was in great request for a thousand uses, which yielded an immediate and ample return, the patience of the public was not adequate to support an undertaking where reimbursement could not be expected for some years, though certain in the end; and your memorialists expressed their conviction, founded on experience, that neither this nor any similar work would succeed in the United States, unless the Government could patronize and assist the efforts of individuals until at least one work was carried into successful operation.

It will be seen that all reasonable means were used to compel the payment of the subscription; but legal remedies would not produce funds with the celerity necessary to pay workmen and continue their operations; the directors had no alternative, therefore, but to suspend them, or to involve numerous individuals in distress. Some debts were unavoidably left unpaid, but they are of no important amount. The most economical disposal was made of the tools and perishable property of the company, and the works left in such a state that they may be repaired at little expense when the operations are resumed.

Your memorialists, having frequently represented these circumstances, and received no public aid, have been compelled to wait until some happier auspices might enable them to revive a work promising the utmost public advantage; and these they now hope to experience from the present disposition of the National Legislature. After the termination of war, the glory of the arts naturally excites the enterprise of a free people, and your memorialists think they perceive in the acts of the last session of Congress a spirit to foster them: they feel, therefore, emboldened to press their interests upon its attention, and that it would be a dereliction of their duty to omit it.

Your memorialists perceive the general measures adopted by Congress in favor of roads and canals; upon which subject they cannot but feel a hope that, after the subject has been recommended by the Executive Department, and its importance acknowledged in every session for many years, some magnanimous instance will be adopted actually to bestow its benefits upon the country, especially as there is no way in which the money of the public can be expended more essentially to its advantage—a fact which is proved by the example of all nations with whom we are acquainted, who, in this respect, have engaged in a rivalry with each other, to which the United States alone cannot fail to be a party.

While the utility of all undertakings of the kind in question must be universally admitted, the specific adoption of some precise objects seems essential to render their advantages effectual. Amid the numerous improvements which the vast area of our country presents to view, it is obvious that all cannot be undertaken at once; many are not matured; some are in districts which do not possess a population to support them; and others can as yet obtain no individual aid to that which the Government may give them, so that some precedence must be admitted for the benefit of all, since one brief and useful work, carried into complete and successful operation, will surely lead on the rest, while numerous undertakings, pressed on together, will only render each other abortive.

In this situation, your memorialists solicit the particular attention of Congress to the following brief state of the features and merit of the work they represent, which they conceive has an important claim on the patronage of the public:

1st. The utility of opening the communication between the Chesapeake and Delaware has been admitted by all intelligent men, ever since the settlement of the country; and if ever this utility wanted confirmation, it received it during the late war, when, by its means, a most important line of communication and defence might have been formed and maintained.

2d. The more extensive inland navigation from New England to Georgia has been often contemplated, and it is obvious that, if executed, (as no doubt it may be,) it must be done in the outset by opening the two great links between the Chesapeake, Delaware, and Raritan.

3d. The present canal forms the first of these links, and it is already begun. The preliminary operations to organize a company to make the necessary surveys, and to commence a work of this kind, are always attended with difficulty, delay, and expense; these have all been accomplished in the present work, as none ever received a more rigid investigation by the ablest engineers in the United States.

4th. There never was, perhaps, a canal in which the two great requisites for its perfection were so well united as in the present one, viz: a most abundant supply of water and the easiest soil for execution, as, in the whole area of its route, it presents scarcely a single rock or stone or other natural obstacle; in fact, from the shortness of the distance and the ease of its execution, it would almost immediately present to us that object which is so desirable, of an actual successful experiment.

5th. From the immense coasting trade of the Chesapeake and Delaware, the revenue upon it would be so immediate and important as in the highest degree to confirm the confidence of the country in such undertakings.

6th. A part of it is already well executed, and that part is at once the most difficult in the whole route, and the most essential in the prosecution of the rest. If briefly revived, what has been done will be restored at little expense; but it is obvious, if long neglected, must be altogether lost.

7th. Very considerable funds are already in such a state as to depend on the measures of Congress to bring them into full operation. If, by patronage, confidence in the prosecution of the work is revived, the subscriptions already existing, to the amount of $400,000, will be obtained, as shares in which partial payments have been made will become valuable pledges for sums due; besides which, the State of Maryland has passed a conditional law to subscribe two hundred and fifty shares, ($50,000;) the State of Pennsylvania to subscribe three hundred and seventy-five shares, ($75,000,) upon the condition that the United States shall subscribe seven hundred and fifty shares, ($150,000,) and the State of Delaware one hundred shares, ($20,000.) This subscription of Congress, therefore, will organize the rest, and bring into effect funds amply sufficient for executing the whole work.

Under these circumstances, your memorialists cannot but hope for the aid of the National Legislature. If this canal had never been begun, it would now challenge attention among the first national objects of the kind; but, commenced as it has been, and provided with the means of procedure, depending upon one contingency alone, it challenges attention by every consideration which can arise from the propriety of restoring confidence, animating the fortitude of individuals, and giving the lead and direction to those public works which, in all ages and countries, do the utmost honor to the Government, because they are of the greatest advantage to the people.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Nov. 5, 1816.

SIR: In obedience to so much of the order of the honorable the Secretary of War, dated May 31, 1816, as relates to the connexion of the navigation of Elizabeth river, in Virginia, with that of the waters of North Carolina, I have the honor to submit the following report:

The routes ordered to be examined are those two, for the opening of which charters have been granted by the Legislatures of Virginia and North Carolina; one, beginning at or near Whitehouse's landing, on the eastern branch of Elizabeth river, is proposed to be cut by the way of Kempsville, forming at that place an angle, and running thence nearly on a right line to the upper landing on North river, and will occupy a distance of between eight and nine miles.

North river cannot correctly be called a stream; it is rather a creek or arm of Currituck sound, whose small ramifications are found in a low swampy country, which adds to them scarcely any further supply than is derived from the downfall water. A slight swell of the ground separates North river from the small branches of Northwest river, and the southern branch of Elizabeth river. The lowest ground between North landing and the eastern branch of Elizabeth river is along the Beachen swamp, and the branch of North river which interlocks with it; this route, to some persons, has appeared to be the most eligible for the "coastwise canal;" but the projector has, for many cogent reasons, rejected it, and proposes to run the canal along higher ground to the eastward of it. It is not, therefore, to be supposed that a supply of water can be had for a canal so situated from the west; nor is the country to the east of the proposed route much better calculated to afford a supply, the Pungo branch of North river being the nearest body of water to it, (except mere catchwater drains,) and that flows over a tract of land parallel with, but lower than it.

This part of the route was examined in company with gentlemen who had an interest in it, and who acknowledged the impracticability of procuring a stream sufficient for the required purpose—an opinion the result not only of personal examination, but of the clear and unanimous testimony of every resident whom I consulted.

It being impracticable to procure a stream, or even downfall water, sufficient to feed the canal, it then becomes necessary to incur the difficulties, risk, and expense of making a cut eight or nine miles on one level, at least two or three feet below the level of the neap tides, in a swampy country; or, to avoid the swamps, recourse must be had to the high ground, and the expense increased beyond any calculations that have yet been exhibited in relation to the project; and, in doing so, the first difficulties of the work only are avoided, and there yet remains the difficulty of cutting below the level of the tides in a country which the great waters approach on all sides. But it is proposed to supply the canal by means of steam machinery, and this is the only feasible mode that has been suggested; the objection offered to it is, that it would be a constant source of expense, increasing with the decrease of timber.

From North landing the river is navigable for craft of any burden, except at one shoal, on which there is nearly five feet water at high tide. Abreast of White house, on Church's island, in Currituck sound, and six miles southeast of the court-house, there is another shoal of black soft mud, with fine sand mixed; it has four and a half feet of water over it at high tide. Near Salier's, about nine miles south-southeast of the last-mentioned shoal, the channel becomes very narrow and crooked; immediately below Salier's, and about ten miles from White's channel, a sand-bar occurs, with less than four and a half feet over it at high tide. Having passed the sand-bar, the channel deepens as it enters the narrows, which wind in every possible direction through salt marshes for about one thousand six hundred yards to the mud flat, which must be crossed, running due south; it has four feet water on it at high tide. South by east of the mud flat is the Trout hole, a narrow channel running due west about four hundred and fifty yards; it is off the south end of Rattlesnake island. Thence the channel continues south by east one mile and a half to Jew's quarter, one hundred yards below which are the cross rocks, an oyster bank, making across nearly the whole width of the sound; the channel here has five feet water in it at high tide. Thence the channel runs south to Powell's Point, round which it winds in a course nearly west-southwest, and then makes eastwardly to Albe-marle sound. It may be proper here to state that, in speaking (in the phraseology of the country) of the tides in the Currituck, and the other sounds and inland waters with which it is connected, a regular periodical ebb and flow of the waters is not to be understood, but that change which is produced by the action of a strong and constant wind in driving the water from one sound into another; for the inlets are so small, compared with the extent and surface of the sounds and creeks, that the causes which produce tides in the ocean and open bays cannot sensibly affect them during the short period of their operation. In Currituck sound the highest tides prevail, usually, in May; sometimes in the month of March; ordinary tides during Summer, unless it be very dry, or the wind prevail from the north or west; the lowest tides are in cold weather, and always when the wind is from the North.

To render the sound and river navigable at high tide for vessels of five feet draught, it becomes necessary to clear out at least one thousand three hundred yards of the channel at several places, and through shoals of various composition; and the distance to be cleared will be greatly increased if it be thought advisable to make the navigation tolerably direct. But to procure a channel for vessels of six feet draught, the distance to be cleared may be very safely stated at twenty miles, or more.

It has, I believe, been suggested that a canal from Currituck court-house, or its vicinity, to Indiantown, on Indian or North river, a branch of the Albemarle sound, would avoid the shoals, and obviate all objections that can be made to this part of the route. The distance on a right line from the court-house to Indiantown may be estimated at seven miles, and would make the whole distance to be cut, between Norfolk and Albemarle sound, about sixteen miles. But admitting that six feet water may be had at all seasons between the court-house and North river, (which, in truth, is very problematical,) it will be necessary to cut below the level of the surface of the water of the sound, to the depth of at least six feet, or, as in the case of the Kempsville canal, supply water by means of steam machines. The ground between the court-house and Indiantown is higher than the ground between Kempsville and North landing; and to open the canal to six feet below the surface of the sound would require, I presume, a section of nearly thirty feet perpendicular, in some places; and the distance from Kempsville to Albemarle sound would be also considerably increased, for Indian river is very crooked.

The other route ordered to be examined is occupied by the canal which extends from Deep creek, in Virginia, to Joyce's creek, in North Carolina: it is twenty-two miles and two hundred yards long, and is cut on two right lines, which, at two miles within the Virginia line, make with each other an angle of about one hundred and forty-seven degrees. This canal passes through the Great Dismal Swamp, three miles and a quarter to the eastward of Lake Drummond, or, as it is called in that section of the country, "Drummond's pond." This canal is supplied in dry seasons by a drain from the lake, and in very wet seasons by the flow of the waters of the swamp. It is, at the feeder, sixteen feet six inches above the ordinary level of the water in Joyce's creek, and in dry seasons at least six feet below the level of the lake. Other measurements have made the height of the surface of the lake, above high water mark, in Nansemond river, twenty-four feet.

The tract of country occupied by the swamp lies, to the southward, along the head branches of Perquimans river, Little river, Pasquotank river, and North, or Indian river, which flows into Albemarle sound; to the eastward, along the branches of Northwest river, which flows into Currituck sound; to the northeast and north, along the heads of the southern and western branches of Elizabeth river; and to the northwest, along the eastern and southern creeks of Nansemond river. The ridge of land which separates the swamp from the head waters of Summerton and Bennet's creeks lies west of it. From the lake to the high ground west of it the distance is about three miles.

That the swamp is caused by the overflowing of Drummond lake and of the small streams to the westward of it, and not by its own springs, is an opinion generally entertained by the most intelligent and best informed persons in the neighborhood, and in support of which very cogent reasons are offered. The ridge of land which separates the heads of Bennet's and Summerton creeks from the swamp is about ten feet higher than the lake; from this ridge many small streams run to the eastward, until meeting with a sudden declivity, from whence also issue innumerable springs of water, they spread over the surface of the land, and fall chiefly into Lake Drummond, between Orapeake and Jericho; they cannot, however, be supposed to be equal to the supply of a body of water which is stated to be nearly seven miles long by five miles wide, having nine feet depth of water within thirty yards of its shores, twelve feet at three hundred yards, and fourteen feet in the centre, and which never shrinks more than eighteen or twenty inches in the very driest seasons, but continues to overflow at all times a tract of country so extensive as that which is covered by the Dismal Swamp.

When the canal was projected, twenty-five years ago, it was believed that the country through which it was to be cut was a perfect level, without an inclination of surface sufficient even to enable the waters of the lake to flow off through the canal when it should be opened. It was even feared, it would seem, that, should more water than was requisite to fill the canal be permitted to escape from the lake, the dry and cultivated lands in its vicinity might be injured; and such continued to be the opinion entertained, until, a ditch being cut and locks constructed, it was found, when in the dry seasons the water ceased to flow but through the feeder of the lake, that at the head of a lock the water was deep and smooth, while at some distance from it, and towards the feeder, there was a constant but shallow current.

This circumstance, for the first time, induced an opinion that the country between the tide waters and the lake was not perfectly level; there were then constructed intermediate locks, yet at the foot of each there has never been more than eighteen or twenty inches depth of water. In this situation the canal (if it may be so denominated) remained until the late war and other circumstances combined to force into view the absolute necessity of a more liberal and enlarged intercommunication between Elizabeth or Nansemond river and the waters of North Carolina.

During the Summer of the present year, the managers have engaged in the work of deepening and widening the canal with a correct and enterprising liberality, which is, however, unfortunately limited by the difficulty of obtaining the requisite funds. They propose that, for the present, it shall have an average surface width of twenty-eight feet, with a talus just sufficient to preserve the banks, and that it shall be capable of floating vessels drawing at least four feet water. To accomplish this purpose, it is calculated that they must expend nearly $80,000. Heretofore the general surface width has not exceeded eighteen feet; in some places it is more, in some less. An additional cut in depth is making from the foot of each lock towards the head of the one next below it, so that the bottom shall in no place be less than six feet from the level of the country, or eight feet from the top of the bank.

The only doubts that occur as to the practicability of rendering this canal navigable for vessels of six feet draught arise from the nature of the soil through which it passes, and the depth of the water at its outlets. When the first cut was made, the water oozed through the sides and bottom of the canal, carrying with it a quantity of sand, which in some places choked the passage, by forming shoals, which threatened to reappear as often as they were removed. They were supposed to be the most serious obstacle to the deepening of the canal. During the last Summer, one of these places has been deepened two feet below the old bottom without any difficulty, and presents a fine dry surface of sand mixed with some blue clay; and it is believed that it might be further deepened without striking a vein of water. The sides of the canal have become compact and firm by the settling of the soil, as is the case with all the cleared land in the swamp since the water has been drained by the canal, and the numerous small cuts made for bringing shingles and staves out of the woods. Generally, the soil has sunk twelve inches; the doubts which arose from this source have, therefore, in a great measure ceased.

The Pasquotank is a deep and crooked river, into which Joyce's creek empties; the only obstruction in it is a narrow sand-bar about a mile and a half from the outlet of the canal, over which there is usually four feet water.

Deep creek, which empties into the southern branch of Elizabeth river, and into which the canal disembogues, has been filled up by the sand from the canal the distance of nearly a mile, and is incapable of floating vessels of any burden at low tide; at high tide, however, vessels drawing three-and-a-half to four feet can navigate it. It is proposed either to remove the sand, or, which would be the most effectual, and perhaps the cheapest method, to make a new cut of four or five hundred yards to another branch of the creek, which affords a sufficient depth of water for the required draught.

In considering the relative advantages of these routes for military and naval purposes, on the assumption that they may be of equal depth, (a proposition already considered in this report,) it is necessary to view them during a war with some maritime Power, in which rapidity of movement and complete security should, as much as possible, be combined in the transportation of supplies, materials, and troops.

Currituck court-house, near which the lower canal route must pass, is but ten miles distance from the inlet; and the sound, which is not more than four miles average width, is separated from the ocean by a sand beach so low as to expose to the view of ships cruising along the coast everything that passes down it. It cannot be considered safe during war, unless an armed force be constantly stationed at the inlet. It is so near the Chesapeake as to be considered within the cruising ground of vessels blockading that bay, and was visited during the late war by the enemy, who burnt or carried off the few craft they found in it.

On the contrary, the upper route is perfectly safe, being separated from the ocean and bay by a very difficult country, and the land around Lake Drummond affords positions capable of being maintained by a small force against great numbers. The security of this route continues until it coincides with the other near Roanoke island, when it in some measure becomes exposed, yet not so much as the lower route is in passing down Currituck sound.

As it regards distance, the Currituck route has greatly the advantage, being about fifteen miles shorter than the swamp route, calculating from Norfolk to Roanoke island, near the entrance of Albemarle sound. But for the transportation of supplies from the country bordering on the Roanoke, Chowan, and Perquimans rivers, and the other branches of Albermarle sound, the upper route is the best, not only as it regards safety, but in distance also; and its connexion with the canal proposed to be cut from the falls of the Roanoke adds much to its importance. Whether this canal be cut round the south side of the falls, leaving the produce of the country connected with the Dan, Staunton, and Roanoke rivers, to pass off by the natural channel of the river; whether it be cut from the north side of the river to Murfreesborough on the Meherrin only; or, finally, whether it be continued up Bennet's creek to the White Oak Spring marsh, or to Suffolk on the Nansemond river, its connexion with the Great Dismal Swamp canal is intimate and important.

The country with which either of the canals would immediately connect Elizabeth river is capable of furnishing many materials and supplies for the Army and Navy; and there may now be had from it red and white oak of a large growth, red cedar, cypress, juniper, holly, beach, poplar, black and sweet gum, white, yellow, and pitch pine, and maple. Much flax is raised, and Indian corn, wheat, tobacco, cotton, and hemp may be had from it. Considerable numbers of horned cattle, sheep, and swine, are raised in the low country for market; and the waters of North Carolina furnish great quantities of shad and herring. Iron ore is found in the mountains, where there are some foundries, and small quantities of lead have been procured; it is probable that sufficient for the purposes of Government might be had, if a communication were opened with the country containing those minerals. An assertion has been hazarded, which, though loose, deserves investigation; that sulphur and saltpetre may be procured from the mountains. Tar and turpentine form some of the principal articles for exportation, and are to be had from the country round Edenton, as well as from other places. It may be satisfactory to exhibit the following list of some of the most bulky articles passed through the Dismal Swamp canal in the year 1815, during the few weeks it was open for navigation; they are exclusive of articles paying toll by valuation, and of the large amount of coasting tonnage which passes to sea through Currituck and Ocracoke inlets, and down Core sound; 6,519,419 shingles, 1,160,591 staves, from the south and east sides of Lake Drummond, and exclusive of those sent by the way of Norfolk; 16,703 bushels of Indian corn; 2,313 bushels of rice; 2,138 hogsheads of tobacco; 2,762 barrels of fish; 3,575 barrels of tar; 529 casks of turpentine spirits; 2,475 bales of cotton; 119 barrels of black lead; 327 tons of iron; 181 tons of lead, and powder and shot.

Ship timber and the bulky materials for house building are immediately shipped for their place of ultimate destination; the canal, in its present state, being considered incapable of admitting them to pass through it. It is to be considered, also, that, on account of the difficulty presented by the falls of the Roanoke, the produce of the country bordering on that river, and on its branches, the Dan and Staunton rivers, generally finds its way over land to Petersburg. The country south of the Roanoke and of Albemarle sound is nearly equally accessible by both routes.

It may be well, also, before concluding this report, (already, perhaps, drawn to too great a length,) to observe, that if the navigation of Currituck sound be supposed to possess any peculiar advantages, except in point of distance, or if the value of the productions of the country bordering on it, should justify the expense of a direct water communication with Elizabeth river, such communication can be obtained by connecting the head of Northwest river with the Dismal Swamp canal. This river has its source in the morass, eastward of Lake Drummond, and serves as one of the drains of that body of water; it crosses the canal north of the feeder, and enters Currituck sound south, and within about a mile of the mouth of North river. By clearing out the bed of this stream for the distance of about four miles, or by making a lateral canal of much less than that distance, the desired communication would be established at a trifling expense compared with the cost of a practicable canal by the way of Whitehouse's landing and North river, and would possess nearly all its advantages, aided by its lateral cut, if we except that of the rapid movement of gunboats between Lynnhaven bay and Currituck sound.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

P. S. My report on so much of the order of May 31, 1816, as relates to the defence of the Chosapeake Bay, &c., is in the hands of Lieutenant Col. George Bomford, of the Ordnance corps; other materials collected during last Summer remain to be reported as occasion shall require. Respectfully,

INTERNAL DUTIES.

The order of the day, on the proposition to repeal the internal taxes, having been announced, a motion was made to postpone the orders of the day, in order to take up the annual pension bill. This motion was supported by Messrs. CALHOON, CHAPPELL, TAYLOR, FORSYTH, and SOUTHARD, and opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS, FLETCHER, WEBSTER, and CANNON, in an animated conversation, rather than debate, and was negatived, 67 votes to 65.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day, on the resolution to repeal the internal duties.

Mr. SHEFFEY withdrew a motion he had previously made to amend the resolve, so as to read nearly as follows: "Resolved, 'That the Army shall be reduced to six thousand men, and the 'acts laying internal duties, &c., be repealed.'"

Mr. JACKSON made a motion, which he said he felt constrained by imperious necessity to offer, to prevent a further waste of the time of the House on a proposition which could lead to no result, to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. DESHA, HARDIN, and KING, and supported by Mr. HUBBERT. On the one hand it was said the proposition was one of great importance, on which every one had made up their minds and were probably ready to decide. On the other hand, the importance of the subject was admitted, but the possibility of deciding it definitively at the present session, either one way or the other, was denied.

The yeas and nays having been required on the motion, some gentlemen expressed other reasons for their votes.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he was disposed to vote for a partial repeal of the taxes, but being now altogether convinced that the discussion would consume the whole session, without the possibility of arriving at a practical result, he should vote for a postponement of the subject.

Mr. FLETCHER exhorted the gentlemen in favor of the repeal, not to be deterred by the considerations presented, from voting against this motion. He hoped they would march boldly up to the question, and that the House would, for once, take the side of the people.

Mr. McLEAN, on the other hand, under the impression that the continuance of this discussion would prevent the transaction of any other business at the present session, asked how the members of this House, on their return home, could account to the people for the discharge of their duty? We are sent here, said he, to perform legislative acts; and it is not he who exclaims that he is the friend of the people, that best performs the duty of a Representative; but he who endeavors to discharge his duty conscientiously and effectually.

Mr. YATES said, if he could conceive it possible that this question could be examined in all its bearings at this session, he should be the last to wish to defer it. But, seeing the differing opinions on this subject, he was convinced the further consideration of the subject would only tend to the consumption of time, and he felt himself obliged to vote to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. PICKERING, though in favor of a reduction of the Army, was opposed to a repeal of the taxes, and therefore in favor of postponement, for various reasons which he assigned; a leading one of which was, the moral effect of the duty on whiskey, to limit the consumption of it.

Mr. KING intimated that the whole amount of Mr. PICKERING's argument was, that all the taxes ought to be retained, that the whole nation should be taxed for the sake of a few miserable drunkards.

Mr. ALEXANDER was in favor of laying the resolution on the table; not that he was opposed to a repeal of the taxes—but he should conceive it mere pretension, at the present period of the session, to vote for the resolution.

Mr. LITTLE said he believed many of the taxes to act oppressively on a large portion of his constituents, and should therefore have been in favor of a repeal of them, had not the question of a reduction of the Army been connected with it. He believed his constituents, if the question was put to them individually, would not consent to the repeal of the taxes, if it was to involve the reduction of the Army.

The question on laying the resolution on the table, was then taken, and resulted—yeas 77, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Mr. HULBERT spoke at some length in decided opposition to the repeal, on the broadest grounds.

Mr. FORSYTH, conceiving that it must now be obvious to every gentleman that no result could flow from this proposition, at the present session, moved, to try the sense of the House, to postpone the resolution to a day beyond the session.

After some conversation on this motion, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Mr. PICKENS moved to amend the resolution by adding to the end of it these words—"and the duty on salt," so as to repeal that duty also.

This proposition gave rise to much debate, in which Mr. KILBOURN particularly spoke at considerable length, in opposition to the amendment, but in favor of the main proposition.

The question on the proposed amendment was decided by yeas and nays—for the amendment 91, against it 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Breckenridge, Brown, Bryan, Burwell, Cady, Calhoun, Chappell, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Condict, Conner, Cooper, Creighton, Crocheron, Culpeper, Dickens, Edwards, Findley, Fletcher, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Griffin, Hall, Harrison, Heister, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hungerford, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jewett, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Law, Lewis, Love, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyon, William P. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEFFEY and Mr. RANDOLPH renewed the discussion of yesterday, made a number of remarks on subjects not perhaps immediately connected with the proposition before the House, but which had been introduced into the debate.

Proceedings.

H. of R.

Mr. FORSYTH spoke at some length, and decidedly, against the passage of the resolution, as well because of the state of the country and our finances, as of the impolicy of annihilating entirely the system of internal duties.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and negatived.

Mr. MILLS moved to amend the resolution so as to make it provide that the duties on brown sugar, coffee, bohea, and souchong teas, imported spirits, and one or two other articles, should be reduced one-half.

The question being stated thereon, a division thereof was called for; and stated upon the first member thereof, to wit: on "brown sugar," when another motion was made to adjourn, which succeeded, and the House adjourned about five o'clock.

FRIDAY, February 21.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the District of Maine, complaining of a late act of the Governments of the British provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which subjects plaster of Paris to a duty of twenty shillings sterling per ton if exported to any part of the United States east of Boston, which act, also, prohibits the exportation of that article except in British ships; and praying that such regulations may be adopted as will countervail the injurious operation of the said act; which petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the western land district of the State of Louisiana, whose claims have been rejected by the Board of Commissioners, and praying for a revision of the decisions of the said commissioners.—Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill respecting the district court of the United States, in the northern district of New York; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the redemption of the public debt.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Haslett," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and together with the bill committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning invalid pensions.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of David Ross, for himself, and in behalf of the legal representatives of George

Webb, deceased; which was read, and the resolutions therein contained are as follow:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners so far as it relates to claims of further credits on the bond of Mr. Webb, ought not to be granted.

Resolved, That the proper officer of the Treasury Department take the necessary steps for terminating the suit instituted against George Webb, and others, of Virginia, and that when determined, he proceed forthwith to the collection of whatever amount may appear to be due the United States.

The first of the said resolutions were agreed to, and the second ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, also reported a bill directing the transfer of unclaimed pensions, and limiting their payment at the Treasury only; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill authorizing the sale of a fraction of land in the district of Vincennes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the bill to establish additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri.

Mr. HULBERT, from the committee to which was referred the petition of the Berkshire Association for the promotion of Agriculture and Manufactures, made a report thereon; which was read; when, Mr. H. reported a bill to establish a National Board of Agriculture; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Archibald McDonald, of James Babbitt, of James H. Rose, of Isadore Rinsensio, of Nimrod Young, and of Henry Bradley; also reports adverse to the propriety of allowing bounty to soldiers who enlisted prior to the commencement of the late war; to the expediency of allowing extra pay and bounty to the representatives of such soldiers as died before being mustered in their regiment; also on the propriety of making further provision for military services during the late war; which subjects had been committed to the consideration of the committee. The reports were all ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, reported a bill to regulate the trade in plaster of Paris; which was twice read, and (after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. F. that the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and not to take the usual course of going through a Committee of the whole House, which motion was opposed by Messrs. LITTLE, SMITH, of Maryland, BURWELL, and ROSS, as being too summary a course for the great importance of the subject, and supported by Messrs. FORSYTH and KING,) the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory;" and "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive;" and the bill from the House, entitled "An act concerning the navigation of the United States," with amendments, in which bills and amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. JACKSON offered the following resolution, which he stated grew out of the report made a few days ago by the committee on the part of this House on the subject:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives of the United States, to notify the honorable JAMES MONROE of his election to the office of President of the United States, for the ensuing term of four years: and that the Speaker of this House cause a similar notice to be given to the honorable DANIEL D. TOMPKINS of his election to the office of Vice President of the United States, for the same term.

The resolution being read, was agreed to, and a committee appointed accordingly.

And Messrs. JACKSON and PITKIN, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting two hundred copies of the register of the officers of the Navy, for the use of the members of this House.

The following bills from the Senate, viz: the bill to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory; the bill to provide for reporting the decisions of the Supreme Court; the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor; and the bill to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and the olive; were severally twice read and referred; and

The amendments of the Senate to the bill concerning the navigation of the United States, were read and referred.

The following engrossed bills were severally read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence, to wit: the bill making provision for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year 1817; the bill making additional appropriations to defray the expenses of the Army and militia during the late war; the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy for the year 1817; the bill freeing from postage, hereafter, all letters and packets to and from James Madison; the bill supplementary to the act further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; the bill to repeal the act providing for the safe-keeping and accommodation of prisoners of war; the bill concerning the compensation of the District Attorney for the district of Massachusetts; and the bill to authorize the extension of the Columbian turnpike within the District of Columbia.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning invalid pensioners, and the bill granting a pension to Commodore Richard Taylor; which, having been considered and gone through, were reported to the House with amendments; and, with the amendments, severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

INTERNAL DUTIES.

The question first under consideration was the motion made by Mr. MILLS yesterday, and pending when the House adjourned, to reduce the duty on brown sugar, coffee, bohea, and souehong teas, imported spirits, and one or two other articles, one half.

Mr. MILLS opposed the general repeal contemplated by the original resolution, and advocated his amendment; expressing his reasons at large for approving a steady but moderate system of internal taxation, as well a direct tax on lands, &c., as others, and particularly on ardent spirits and articles of luxury. When he had concluded,

Mr. THOMAS, of Tennessee, for the purpose of coming to a decision on the question, and foreseeing no termination to the present discussion, demanded the previous question on the resolution.

The question was then put "Shall the previous question be now taken?" and decided in the negative—yeas 36.

Mr. THOMAS then moved that the resolution be postponed to the 2d day of March, which was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Archer, Ather-ton, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Bennett, Betts, Birdseye, Breckenridge, Brown, Caldwell, Calhoun, Carr of Massachusetts, Chappell, Clark of New York, Clarke of North Carolina, Condict, Conner, Creighton, Crocheron, Findley, Forney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Griffin, Hahn, Harrison, Heister, Hopkinson, Huger, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving of New York, Jackson, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Little, Lowndes, Lumpkin, McLean, Middleton, Miller, Mills, Milnor, Jeremiah Nelson, Thomas M. Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Pickering, Pleasants, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Ruggles, Savage, Schonck, Smith of Pennsylvania, Southard, Stearns, Taggart, Tallmadge, Taul, Taylor of New York, Taylor of South Carolina, Telfair, Thomas, Townsend, Ward of Massachusetts, Webster, Wendover, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, Thomas Wilson, Woodward, Yancey, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Baylies, Birdsall, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Bryan, Burwell, Cady, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clayton, Clendennin, Comstock, Cook, Cooper, Crawford, Culpeper, Davenport, Desha, Dickens, Edwards, Fletcher, Goldsborough, Hale, Henderson, Hendricks, Herbert, Hooks, Hungerford, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, Kilbourn, King, Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lyle, Lyon, William Maclay, William P. Maclay, Marsh, Mason, McCoy, McKee, Moffitt, Moore, Moseley, Hugh Nelson, Noyes, Paris, Peter, Pickens, Piper, Powell, Reed, Roane, Sharp, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Tyler, Vose, Wallace, Ward of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Whiteside, Wilcox, and Williams.

So the subject was laid on the table.

Military Establishment.

H. OF R.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the whole House, made some days ago, on sundry bills connected with different branches of the Military Establishment.

The one first taken up was the bill authorizing the establishment of a national armory on the Ohio river or its branches.

This bill gave rise to considerable discussion, turning principally on the expediency of authorizing an additional armory at this time; in which the bill was opposed by Mr. YANCEY, on the ground of its partiality to the West, and denying a similar establishment to the South; and by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; also, by Mr. CADY and Mr. PICKERING. It was advocated by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, HARRISON, LOWNDES, HUGER, and McLEAN.

The motion for postponing the bill indefinitely was finally carried—ayes 70. So the bill was rejected.

The House then proceeded to consider the succeeding reports, on the bill to amend the act making further provision for military services during the late war; on the bill respecting the pay and emoluments of brevet officers; and on the bill concerning the invalids of the Revolutionary war, and the widows and children of the militia and of the soldiers of the Army during the late war. The two first bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and some discussion ensuing on the details of the bill last named, a motion was made to postpone the same indefinitely; when the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 22.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, praying to the same effect with the petition presented yesterday by Mr. BRADBURY, from inhabitants of the District of Maine.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the trade in plaster of Paris.

Mr. MIDDLETON presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, requesting that further measures may be adopted for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The Committee of Claims were discharged from a further consideration of the several petitions, and other matters referred to them at the present session, and upon which they have not reported.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to alter and establish certain post roads; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PICKERING, from the Committee on the African slave trade, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the navigation of the United States," reported their agreement thereto. The amendments were then read and concurred in by the House.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, the House took up the bill for opening and cutting out a road from the Tennessee line through the Chickasaw country, &c., and (after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. CADY to postpone the bill indefinitely, and an unsuccessful attempt by Mr. KING to recommit it) the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the committee appointed on the 25th instant, to present a resolution to the President of the United States, requesting him to report to the next session of Congress the best practicable mode of defending the waters of the Chesapeake, reported that the committee had performed that duty, and that the President answered it would not be in his power to comply with the request of the resolution, but that he had no doubt his successor would pay all due attention to it.

Mr. CANNON moved that the several orders of the day be postponed to Monday, and that the House proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by him some weeks ago to reduce the Army; which motion was negatived—ayes 39, noes 69.

The following engrossed bills were severally read the third time, passed, and sent to the Senate, to wit:

The bill concerning invalid pensioners:

The bill to amend the act making further provision for military services during the late war; and

The bill concerning the pay and emoluments of brevet officers.

The last named bill was very earnestly opposed by Mr. HARRISON, who contended for a compensation corresponding to their brevet rank, to those officers, who, by their eminent services, had received the distinction of brevet promotion, and cited cases in which services had been so essential and so brilliant, as to have been rewarded with two brevets, and some instances in which a captain in the line was a Lieutenant Colonel by brevet, which rank ought to be supported by suitable emoluments.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Commodore Richard Taylor, was read the third time, as amended by the Committee, and passed.

The House then took up the bill concerning invalids of the Revolutionary war, and of the widows and children of the militia, and of the soldiers of the Army during the late war, as reported by the Committee of the Whole—the motion made yesterday by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, to postpone the bill indefinitely being under consideration.

This motion gave rise to considerable discussion, in which Messrs. JACKSON, EDWARDS, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, HARRISON, and COMSTOCK, opposed the postponement; and Messrs. HARDIN and TAYLOR, of New York, supported it. The motion was finally decided in the affirmative by a decisive majority, and the bill indefinitely postponed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to provide for the purchase and distribution of the Laws of the United States;" and "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal;" in which bills they request the concurrence of this House.

PETITION OF JAMES VILLERE.

Mr. YANCEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of James Villere; which was read; when Mr. Y. reported a bill for the relief of the said James Villere; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud. The report is as follows:

That, at the time the State of Louisiana was invaded by the British forces, the petitioner, living near New Orleans, owned and occupied a valuable house, from which his family retired, and which was sometimes occupied by the British forces, and sometimes by the American, during the invasion. During this time, the troops of the United States used a quantity of his wood and some of his fencing for fuel. At the time the British forces left New Orleans, it was considered prudent and proper by General Jackson to fill up a canal through the plantation of the petitioner; in consequence of which a part of the plantation, which was planted with sugar cane, was overflowed, and continued so long overflowed, before the news of peace reached that place, that he was prevented from making a crop.

The petitioner prays to be paid the value of such injury as he has sustained, in consequence of the filling up of the canal, and the value of his wood and fencing.

It is difficult to determine, precisely, what are the damages for which the petitioner is entitled to indemnity. The committee, however, after having bestowed some consideration on the subject, are of opinion he should be paid the value of his wood and fencing necessarily used for fuel, a sum sufficient to open the canal, and one year's rent for such part of his plantation planted in sugar cane as was overflowed by filling up the canal; and therefore report a bill to that effect.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS, &c.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act granting bounties in land to certain Canadian volunteers. [Providing that no bounty shall be given to any of the said volunteers, except where it shall appear they have served the full term of — months, and whose name shall appear on the muster roll of the said corps, except prevented by wounds received in battle, &c., and instead of the mode of granting the bounty directed by the former act, to allow a bounty of — acres, agreeably to rank.]

This bill occupied a good deal of time, and gave rise to considerable debate, partly on the policy of having granted the bounty at all, so widely discussed at the last session; but principally on the details of the bill, and the proper steps to prevent the frauds which it appears have been so extensively attempted by persons not entitled to the benefit of the act of last session. After the adoption of various amendments, the Committee rose and reported the bill; which was then ordered to be engrossed as amended.

The same Committee of the Whole reported, without amendment, the bill granting donations of land to the disbanded officers of the late Army, and then the bill was, on motion of Mr. CANNON, laid on the table.

After an attempt by Mr. YANCEY, which he afterwards withdrew, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bills to establish an invalid corps, and for authorizing additional Military Academies, for the purpose of having them laid on the table, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 24.

Mr. POPE presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Missouri, requesting that certain companies of rangers raised in said Territory may be allowed their full pay; and that certain other rangers may also be allowed some compensation, as they were discharged in consequence of a greater number having enlisted than was required by law.

Mr. POPE presented another resolution of the Legislature of the said Territory, requesting that the right of pre-emption in the purchase of land may be extended to such of the inhabitants of that Territory, as lost their property by removing from the frontiers by order of Governor Howard.

Mr. POPE also presented another resolution of the Legislature of the said Territory, soliciting the establishment of additional post routes therein.

Ordered, That the said resolutions lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill, supplementary to "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage;" which was read the first time, and ordered to be read a second time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to this House, at their next session, the number and conditions of the contracts which have been made for the supply of arms for the United States, since the adoption of the present Constitution, specifying the loss, if any, which the public have sustained by the non-fulfilment of such contracts, or by the advance of money on account of the same; together with any other information he may possess tending to show the advantages or disadvantages attending that mode of obtaining arms, compared with that of national armories; and that he report therewith the amount of money expended in each of the present national armories, the number and species of arms there manufactured, and the number and species of arms repaired.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was agreed that a joint committee of both Houses be appointed to examine and report to their respective Houses what business is pending before them, and which it is indispensable to act upon previous to the adjournment; and Messrs. SMITH of Maryland and YANCEY were appointed on the part of this House.

The Committee of the Whole, to whom were committed the bill for the establishment of an invalid corps, and the bill making provision for three additional Military Academies, were discharged therefrom; and the said bills were postponed indefinitely.

The bill from the Senate "to provide for the purchase and distribution of the Laws of the United States," and the bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal;" were severally twice read, and committed.

The following bills, which originated in this House, were severally read a third time, and passed:

A bill to amend the act, entitled "An act granting bounties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers," passed on the 5th March, 1816; a bill "for the relief of certain officers;" and a bill "making an appropriation for opening and cutting out a road therein described."

The bill "to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy," was indefinitely postponed.

The bill "to authorize the settlement and payment of certain claims for the service of the militia," passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles: An act to provide for the punishment of crimes and offences committed within the Indian boundaries; an act making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes; an act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands on the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described; an act authorizing vessels departing from the town of the Bayou St. John and basin of the Canal de Carondelet for foreign ports, to clear out at the custom-house in New Orleans; an act in addition to an act, entitled "an act for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the courts of the United States;" an act to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and an act for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Yarnall, deceased; in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the punishment of crimes and offences committed within the Indian boundaries," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the vessels departing from the town of the Bayou St. John and basin of the Canal de Carondelet, for foreign ports, to clear out at the custom-house in New Orleans," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the courts of the United States,'" was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John J. Yarnall, deceased," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-day. It was read the third time accordingly, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The bill from the Senate, "to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States," passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was reported to the House; whereupon,

A motion was made by Mr. PICKENS, to strike out all the said bill, after the enacting clause, and, in lieu thereof, to insert the bill reported by a select committee of this House on the 17th ult., for the admission of the whole Territory into the Union as a State; which motion was negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, that the said bill, and the whole subject, be postponed indefinitely; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 80, as follows:

This motion was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," and on several other bills of a private nature, but did not finally act on them before an adjournment took place.

TUESDAY, February 25.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide for the furnishing the house of the President of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the redemption of the public debt.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. HUGH NELSON:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of lessening the duties upon wines, imported from France, and other foreign countries, and report to this House thereupon.

The said resolution was read, and on the question, "Will the House now consider the same?" it was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making Darien, in the State of Georgia, a port of entry and delivery.

The bill reported yesterday by the Committee of Ways and Means, supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage, was read the second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims on the petition of Ann Welch; and having reported progress, the House refused the Committee of the Whole leave to sit again, and the report was laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Lawrence, and others, passed through a Committee of the whole House, was amended, and ordered to a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill from this House, entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 9th of April, 1816, with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

LETTER FROM JUDGE TOULMIN.

The SPEAKER presented a letter addressed to him by Harry Toulmin, Judge of the Superior Court of the United States for the Mississippi Territory, enclosing certain depositions in relation to the charges made against him by Edwin Lewis, of that Territory; which letter and depositions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, February, 1817.

SIR: I was truly surprised, on my arrival at Washington City, which I visited at the request of the representatives of a large proportion of the people of the Mississippi Territory, to find that some very extraordinary charges had been transmitted against me by Mr. Edwin Lewis. As I had no conception that any such attack was in agitation, I am unprovided with testimony to refute the specific charges, and as my place of residence is more than one thousand miles from this city, it was impossible that I could procure it sufficiently soon to be exhibited to the present Congress. Letters, which I have received from thence, have been more than forty days on their passage, and none of them have intimated that any such attack as that made by Mr. Lewis was known in this Territory.

My object, sir, in troubling you with this address, is not so much to enter into an examination of the allegations made by my accuser, as to express my hope that if the communication of Mr. Lewis has not, on the very face of it, such marks of passion as to render it unworthy of any further notice from Congress, he may, at least, be confined to those charges of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," which, agreeably to the Constitution, are the only grounds of impeachment; and that, if he should venture to renew his attack, he be directed to furnish me with a copy of his charges, before he transmits them to the Congress of the United States.

My accuser brings forward nine specific charges against me. Five of these are for deciding erroneously, as he says, in which he was a party, and in two an attorney.

The Congress, I am satisfied, will not presume that a party is more impartial than the judge; nor will it convert itself into a court of errors and appeals, by entering into an examination of the correctness of a judgment, but will confine the accuser to those charges of corruption or vicious bias, of which the Congress can properly take notice. Not that I feel any sort of apprehension from any scrutiny which might be made of the correctness of my decisions; but I know that the Congress would not feel itself authorized to enter into the investigation; and I am well aware of the inconvenience and difficulty which would attend the production of the records of eight different courts, which I attend twice a year, and the average distance of which, from my place of residence, is nearly sixty miles.

Of the three criminal cases, which he has brought into view; the neglect which he complains of in two of them, if there has been any neglect at all, must have been, not in the court, but in the prosecuting attorney. In one of them, Mr. Lewis was himself the real plaintiff against an officer of the United States, who cut some timber from a piece of land, to which Mr. Lewis obtained a pre-emption title. This case must have occurred at least ten years ago. I never heard of any complaint before of the conduct of the court, and, therefore, may not have an accurate recollection of the circumstances; but I think it highly probable that the Attorney General might have deemed it improper to push a prosecution against a military officer for cutting timber for the purpose of erecting a fort on the lands of the United States; although Mr. Lewis obtained, about the same time, the privilege of purchasing them. That Attorney General now resides in Tennessee, and I am sure is able to defend himself. Another case is of more recent date; but I never heard of the circumstances before. Mr. Lewis says, that the court did not recognise witnesses to appear, when it ought to have done so. Here, I suppose it was the duty of the public prosecutor to apply to the court for that purpose; but it is not alleged that he did so apply, or that the court rejected the application.

The other case is one in which a father and his two young sons were convicted of larceny. The court punished the father more than the sons. Mr. Lewis says, they all ought to have been punished alike. And he is right; if the court were compelled to pass judgment agreeably to the clause of the statute to which Mr. Lewis alludes—but the court was of opinion that the indictment was founded on another clause of the criminal law of the Territory, which left a discretion with the court; and judgment was given accordingly, and the father received only five lashes less than the law permitted to be given, whilst the boys received twenty or twenty-five less.

The remaining specific charge exhibited by Mr. Lewis (though placed first in the catalogue) is that the accused held court in Mobile, and heard and decided divers causes on the holy Sabbath.

The truth is, that after a long and fatiguing circuit then drawing to a close, being in a town where all the public worship consisted in some ceremonies performed by a Spanish priest, and without one word to explain them, and where it is believed the billiard table is frequented more even on the Sunday than any church whatsoever, I did even on that day afford to the gentlemen of the bar the opportunity of innocent and useful employment in making some motions and arguing some principles. But no court in any other sense was held; no jurors nor witnesses were summoned, and no sheriff required to attend. Business was put in a train for being done on the next day. I know of no law which forbade this harmless occupation; my own principles did not forbid it under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the Congress of the present day cannot class it among the number of high crimes and misdemeanors, without passing judgment by implication at least on the Congress of 1799, who performed a great deal of legislative business on a Sunday, and on the Congress of 1805, who followed their example. And yet, sir, I must pray you to pardon me for saying that I do not profess to make the conduct of even the august body over which you preside the standard of my faith and practice. But I have no doubt of the purity of their principles, or the correctness of their conduct; and I hope that they will exercise some degree of liberality in judging of mine. I have made these observations, sir, for the purpose of showing the reasonableness of the first object of this application, viz., that my accuser may, in exhibiting charges, be confined within the pale of the Constitution.

My second object is, that he be required to furnish me with a copy of such charges as he may hereafter make. I live, sir, at least 1,000 miles from the Seat of Government. If such charges be sent against me to such a distance, it will be difficult to obtain a knowledge of them after they reach this place and send an answer to them during the same session. The House of Representatives, I presume, would always wish to have as strong evidence as the nature of the case will admit of, before they even profer an accusation. They will not act upon a partial and possibly a distorted representation of circumstances when it can conveniently be avoided. The situation of public officers so remote from the Seat of Government is peculiar. If they are not apprized of charges beforehand, they cannot for a long time unravel the web of the false accuser, and it is a very serious thing to a judicial officer to be held up for twelve months as an object of suspicion by the legislative body. It is not only serious to the individual, but it is serious to the cause of public justice; for you will not everywhere find men, sir, who are willing to brave the tempest to be raised by all the bad passions of the selfish and perverse, when the very first blast of it is attended with effects so appalling.

As to the general charges of partiality, oppression, &c., scattered through Mr. Lewis's letter, I am able to meet them at once; and as they have been read to the House, I trust that the refutation of them will also be read. Major Hargrave, a truly worthy man, and an old soldier and officer of the Revolution from 1775 to the end of the war, and another citizen of respectable standing, and holding a judicial office in our Territory, are now in the city. They have testified as to my conduct for eleven years past, and you yourself, sir, and others from Kentucky, know what it was for ten preceding years. I believe, sir, that I possess a full share of the confidence of my fellow-citizens; but popularity will always have its ebbs and flows, and, perhaps, its flowings with every independent magistrate. And, considering that the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory was a frontier country, and under very peculiar circumstances of embarrassment, and that I was the only Federal officer there in the civil department charged with the maintenance of the laws, I should have reason to be ashamed of myself if I could boast that I have always been popular,

No, sir; under all circumstances I felt it to be my duty to maintain the laws; and at a moment when an impulse very natural to men oppressed by the Spaniards, as my fellow-citizens had been, rendered the illegal project of invading Florida extremely popular, and when troops were actually levied and marched for the purpose, I did not hesitate to resist the torrent, and successfully exerted myself in maintaining the national neutrality.

Civil officers, sir, are less fortunate in some respects than military officers. Military officers, if they triumph at all, triumph over the common enemy. They are hailed, therefore, with unmingled applause. But the humble triumphs of the civil officer are over enemies in the bosom of the Republic; and the applause which greets him, is, for a time at least, exactly, if you will pardon me for using a phrase of the schools—his applause is exactly in the inverse ratio of his dangers, his difficulties, and his successes. The tamest champion of the laws is the champion most exalted.

Under all circumstances, however, I have felt a support in the consciousness of having discharged my duty; and it has afforded some little consolation to me to know that my lot was common to men in similar circumstances; and that if, when presiding as a judicial officer over a district not larger perhaps than Great Britain, I have been attacked by the tongue of slander, and accused of high offences; attacks and accusations equally serious and equally groundless have been made by men much more respectable than my adversaries against every President of the United States save one.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

HARRY TOULMIN.

SINKING FUND, &c.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the redemption of the public debt. [Providing, substantially, to make the Sinking Fund ten millions annually; and to add to the fund of ten millions, the further sum of nine millions, (the existing surplus in the Treasury;) thus, making the whole sum applied this year to the reduction of the debt, amount to nineteen millions of dollars. Also, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, at any time during the present year, to pay to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund the further sum of four millions, to be considered as an advance to that amount on the appropriation of ten millions, payable in the next year. Also, vesting in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be applied to the redemption of the debt, any surplus which may hereafter accrue over and above the sum of two millions, to be always retained in the Treasury.] The bill having been read—

Mr. LOWNDES rose, and, in a speech of considerable length, submitted the views of the Committee of Ways and Means in recommending the present bill, and advocated the policy of applying the proposed sums to the redemption of the public debt.

Mr. GASTON moved the addition of a clause, directing the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to apply the surplus which may accrue, to the purchase of the Government stock, held by the Bank of the United States, if not elsewhere to be obtained, on the terms allowed by this bill, (par.)

This motion produced a good deal of debate, and was finally agreed to without a division.

The bill having been gone through, and the blanks therein filled—

The Committee took up, successively:

The bill to repeal so much of any acts now in force as authorizes an issue of Treasury notes;

The bill authorizing the payment to the State of Georgia of the discount on her quota of the direct tax;

The bill respecting appeals from the assessment of the direct tax;

The bill to authorize the captains of vessels to deposit papers with our Consuls in foreign ports; and

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the bill from the Senate, providing for the more prompt settlement of public accounts.

These bills were severally considered and variously amended.

The last named bill, and the amendments thereto reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, produced a good deal of debate. One feature particularly (the power proposed to be given to the Solicitor of the Treasury to decide who are delinquents, and recover, by summary process, debts due to the Government by individuals) was earnestly opposed by Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. ROBERTSON, and Mr. HOPKINSON, and supported by Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. CALHOUN, and Mr. CADY. All the amendments of importance were agreed to, however, by the Committee of the Whole; and then—

The Committee rose and reported the bills and their amendments to the House.

The report first taken up, was on the bill providing for the redemption of the public debt, and the House agreed to the amendments reported.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, opposed the bill at considerable length, and with much zeal; not that he was averse to paying off the debt of the nation as rapidly as the interest of the country would permit, but because the sum proposed to be added and pledged to the Sinking Fund, would form hereafter an argument against abolishing the system of internal taxes, which he condemned in time of peace, and wished to see put down as quickly as possible. Mr. J. concluded by moving that the two appropriations of nine millions and four millions, (in addition to the regular sum of ten millions,) proposed by the bill, should be deemed and considered as an advance, and part of the fund of ten millions for the three succeeding years.

After some remarks by Mr. LOWNDES, in opposition to the motion, and reply by Mr. JOHNSON, the motion was lost—ayes 46, noes 70.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the remaining bills reported by the Committee, with the exception of the one last named above, were successively agreed to, and the bills ordered to be engrossed.

The House then took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill next in order, referred to above, (to provide for the more prompt settlement of public accounts.)

The debate was resumed on the powers proposed to be vested in the Solicitor of the Treasury, (one of the new officers to be created,) and continued until past 4 o'clock; when, after resisting two previous motions to adjourn, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

Mr. CONDUCT presented a petition of Benjamin Henry Latrobe, Surveyor of the Capitol of the United States, in the City of Washington, stating the reasons of his not being able to furnish in time to the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, a detailed estimate of the moneys necessary to complete the Capitol, and praying that such steps may be taken as may enable him to place his conduct, respecting the estimate submitted and the plan of the Capitol, in its true light; which petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of the Philadelphia Society for promoting American Manufactures, praying that such measures may be adopted as will enable the manufacturers within the United States to continue their operations.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House, and the amendments ordered to be engrossed, and, together with the bill, read a third time to-day.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House, and the amendments ordered to be engrossed, and, together with the bill, read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act, for the more convenient taking affidavits and bail in civil causes depending in the courts of the United States," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

Mr. CONDUCT, from the Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred the letter and estimate of the Commissioner in relation the public square, made a report, as follows:

"The Committee on Public Buildings, to whom was referred the letter and estimate of the Commissioner in relation to the public square, report—that at the last session of Congress, the sum of $30,000 was appropriated for the purpose of improving the public square east of the Capitol, which sum has been expended, and is found to be insufficient for its completion, from causes stated in the letter of the Commissioner. The Committee are of opinion that it will better comport with the original design of the City, and be more satisfactory to the public, to omit the interior wall, in front of the Capitol, and extend the enclosure around the semi-circular area, west of the building. They respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate the sum of — dollars, to complete the improvement of the public square, and that the Commissioner be instructed, with the approbation, and under the direction of the President of the United States, to enclose the semi-circular area west of the Capitol."

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims be discharged from a further consideration of the resolution instructing them to inquire what further provision by law is requisite to enable riding-masters of the Revolutionary war to receive a bounty in land, equal to that allowed to other officers of the same rank.

The House then resumed the unfinished business, on the bill from the Senate, to secure accountability of public moneys, &c.; and much debate took place on amendments proposed to it, in which MESSRS. JACKSON, FORSYTH, LOWNDS, HARDIN, HOPKINSON, ROOT, CALHOUN, and others, engaged. The principal question was on a coercive power proposed to be given to the comptrolling officers of the Treasury against public defaulters, which, on the one hand, it was contended was made necessary by the evils experienced from the laxity of the present system of accountability; and, on the other hand, was opposed as being a violation of the spirit if not the letter of those parts of the Constitution which guard the trial by jury and the liberty and property of the citizen.

The bill was finally recommitted for the purpose of revising its details.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was read the third time, amended by unanimous consent, and passed.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage; an act for the relief of Isaac Lawrence and others, merchants, residing in the city of New York; an act to provide for the redemption of the public debt; an act to repeal so much of any acts now in force as authorizes a loan of money or an issue of Treasury notes; an act respecting the assessment and collection of the direct tax; an act authorizing the deposit of the papers of foreign vessels with the Consuls of their respective nations; an act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the State of Georgia fifteen per centum upon the quota of the direct tax for the year 1816, assumed and paid by that State; were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act making reservation of certain public lands to supply timber for naval purposes," was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the more convenient taking of affidavits and bail in civil causes, depending in the courts of the United States,'" was read the third time, and passed.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' passed the 9th of April, 1816," were read; and a motion was made by Mr. YANCEY to refer the said bill and amendments to the Committee of Claims: When a motion was made by Mr. CLARK, of New York, that the bill be postponed indefinitely, and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative. The question was then taken on the motion to refer to the Committee of Claims, and passed in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud, and on the several other bills committed to the said Committee of the Whole. And after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill for the relief of Caze and Richaud; as also the bill for the relief of William Chism; the bill for the relief of Joseph I. Green; the bill for the relief of Caleb Nichols; the bill for the relief of Alexander Holmes and Benjamin Hough; the bill for the relief of Madame Montreuil; the bill for the relief of James H. Boisgervais; the bill for the relief of Antoine Bienvenu; the bill for the relief of Peter Cazlard; the bill for the relief of John de Castanado; the bill for the relief of Joumonville de Villiers; the bill for the relief of George Buckmaster; the bill for the relief of Berthelemy Duverges; the bill for the relief of William Oliver; the bill for the relief of James Orr; the bill for the relief of Peter Kindall; the bill for the relief of Charles Williams; the bill for the relief of Asa Wells; the bill for the relief of Peyton Short; the bill for the relief of James Villere; the bill from the Senate authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin, deceased; the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, and of Anthony Cruzat and L. P. Duverges; and the bill for the relief of Mary Wells, with an amendment to the latter, which was read and concurred in by the House; and the several bills above mentioned were ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the location of the lands reserved by the first article of the treaty of the 9th of August, 1814, between the United States and the Creek nation, to certain chiefs and warriors of that nation, and for other purposes; and on the several other bills committed to the said Committee of the Whole; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 27.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, presented a petition from sundry inhabitants of the western part of the State of New York, praying that Portland, on Lake Erie, may be made a port of entry and delivery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill, supplementary to the act, entitled, "An act directing the disposition of money paid into the courts of the United States," approved the 18th of April, 1814; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled, "An act to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Stephen Champlin; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

The petitioner states that he is a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States; that, during the year 1814, he commanded the schooner Tigress, then cruising on Lake Huron; that on the night of the 3d of September, he was overpowered by a superior British force, himself badly wounded, and, with his vessel and crew, captured by the enemy; that the petitioner was plundered after the capture of private property of the value of five hundred dollars, for which loss he prays to be compensated by the Government.

The committee, on examining this question, find no precedents to justify them in recommending it to the House to grant the prayer of the petition, but believe that a number of applications on similar principles have been rejected; they therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the joint committee, appointed to examine and report what business is necessary to be acted upon at the present session, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHAPPELL, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal, reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the widow and minor children of Abraham Owen, deceased.

An engrossed bill entitled, "An act for the relief of John De Castanado," was read the third time, amended by unanimous consent, and passed.

The amendment to the bill confirming the title of Miller and Futton, to a tract of land on the Bayou Boeuf, in the State of Louisiana, was read, which said amendment proposes to strike out the first section. And on the question to concur with the Committee of the whole House in striking out the said section, it passed in the affirmative. And so the said bill was rejected.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of James Caze and John Richaud; an act for the relief of William Chism; an act for the relief of Joseph J. Green; an act for the relief of Caleb Nichols; an act for the relief of Alexander Holmes and Benjamin Hough; an act for the relief of Madame Montreuil; an act for the relief of James H. Boisgervais; an act for the relief of Antoine Bienvenu; an act for the relief of Peter Cazlard; an act for the relief of Joumonville de Villers; an act for the relief of George Buckmaster; an act for the relief of Berthelemy Duverges; an act for the relief of William Oliver; an act for the relief of James Orr; an act for the relief of Peter Kindall; an act for the relief of Charles Williams; an act for the relief of Asa Wells; an act for the relief of Peyton Short; an act for the relief of James Villere; an act for the relief of Mary Wells; and an act supplementary to the act, entitled, "An act directing the disposition of money paid in the courts of the United States," approved the 18th of April, 1814; were severally read the third time and passed.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, to wit: an act authorizing vessels departing from the town of the Bayou St. John, and Basin of the Canal de Carondelet, for foreign ports, to clear out at the custom-house in the city of New Orleans; an act authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Flavil Sabin, deceased; an act for the relief of the legal representatives of Ignace Chalmet Delino, deceased, and of Anthony Cruzat and L. P. Duverges; were severally read the third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled, "An act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described," was also read the third time and passed as amended.

The title of the latter bill was amended so as to read, "An act concerning the sale of certain lands therein described."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the widow and minor children of Abraham Owen, deceased, and on the several other bills committed to the said Committee of the Whole; and after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill for the relief of the widow and minor children of Abraham Owen, deceased; the bill for the relief of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher & Co., and Thomas Clifford & Son; and the bill from the Senate for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal, without amendment.

The two first mentioned bills were ordered to be engrossed, and respectively read a third time to-morrow.

A motion was then made by Mr. INGHAM, that the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, be laid on the table; which motion was rejected by the House, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to an act, entitled, "An act for the relief of John Thompson," and the bill from the Senate directing the discharge of William Smith from imprisonment. The committee reported the bills without amendment, and they were ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled, "An act authorizing a subscription for the printing of the tenth volume of public documents," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks.

The Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill of this House, for the relief of William Smith, senior, were discharged from a further consideration of the same, and it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Committee on Naval Affairs was, by order of the House, discharged from the consideration of the petitions of Catherine Young, of Charles Waggoner, of Thomas Church, jr., of Thomas Ewell, of John C. Shindle, of Samuel Cheney, of the Surgeons in the Navy: and they were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommitted the bill "to provide for the prompt settlement of the public accounts," reported sundry amendments thereto; which were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, having reported without amendment the bill from the Senate "authorizing vessels departing from the town of the Bayou St. John and Basin of the Canal de Carondelet, for foreign ports, to clear out at the custom house in the city of New Orleans," the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

Mr. CONDICT, from the Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings, reported a bill making further provision for repairing the public buildings and improving the public square; which was twice read, and committed.

The committee appointed on the memorial of the Society for propagating the Gospel among the Indians and others, were discharged therefrom, and the petition ordered to lie on the table.

CASE OF JUDGE TOULMIN.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Edwin Lewis, containing charges of improper and extrajudicial conduct against Harry Toulmin, a Judge of the Court of the United States in the Mississippi Territory, made the following report:

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry documents furnished by Edwin Lewis to this House, containing charges against Judge Toulmin, which the said Lewis averred that he could maintain and prove, have had them under consideration, and report, that there is no evidence whatever contained in those documents which could warrant any proceeding against Judge Toulmin: that the Committee, although the charges are none of them proved, yet, conceiving themselves bound to give notice, as far as practicable, to the citizen from whom the charges came, that they are prepared to receive testimony to enable them to form a correct judgment upon the law, addressed a letter to Edwin Lewis, stating that this case was referred by the House of Representatives to their consideration, and gave him notice that he should forthwith adduce such testimony as he had pledged himself to produce in verification of his charges. The Committee have been furnished with no other testimony. From the remoteness of the residence of Lewis, time sufficient may not have elapsed for the testimony, if any could be produced, to have reached this place. The Committee consider it improper that this case should be longer continued, upon the slender ground on which it now appears to be founded, to the annoyance of the Judge; inasmuch as Lewis will not be precluded from again submitting this subject to Congress, should he be able to support, by proper testimony, his allegations. Lewis, being a lawyer, must have known that he ought to have exhibited testimony in support of his charges at the time of producing them, if such testimony had existence; and particularly as he alleges that some of them could be proved by the records of courts of justice, he might easily have supplied abstracts from the records. The Committee are of opinion that no further proceedings ought to be had in this case, and, therefore, ask to be discharged from further considering this subject."

The report was concurred in, and the Committee discharged from the subject.

CULTIVATION OF THE VINE, &c.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on sundry bills referred to the same Committee; among which was the bill from the Senate, for disposing of a tract of land, to embrace four townships, on favorable terms to the emigrants, to enable them successfully to introduce the cultivation of the vine and olive, &c.

A motion was made by Mr. HALL, of Georgia, to strike out the first section of the bill. This motion gave rise to a debate, in which the object of the bill was supported by Messrs. HARRISON, SMITH, of Maryland, CLAY, ROBERTSON, CALHOUN, FORSYTH, and others, and opposed by Messrs. HALL, KING, and others.

The arguments against the bill were grounded on the idea of its affording an opening for speculation on the public lands, and of its injudiciously disposing of property of the United States, which might be otherwise more advantageously disposed of. In favor of the bill, were urged the general principles of hospitality, the advantages of the particular culture proposed to be introduced, and, further, the advantages which would accrue to the United States from the introduction of so much industry and such improvement into the midst of its public lands, by which the value of the land would be greatly enhanced, &c.

The motion to strike out the first section was negatived by a large majority.

After some amendments to the bill, on which there was considerable debate, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The bill locating lands to Indian Chiefs and Indian Warriors; the bill allowing further time for entering donation rights to land in the District of Detroit; a bill for the relief of Joseph Summers and John Allen; a bill to continue in force an act "relating to settlers on the several lands of the United States," were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in American and foreign vessels, and an aggregate view of both from the 1st October, 1814, to the 30th September, 1815; which were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to Congress, at the next session, such measures as may be necessary for the more effectual execution of the laws for the collection of the duties on imported goods, wares, and merchandise.

foreign ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States, from any foreign port or place to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, at the same rate, after the 30th day of June, as is imposed on such ships or vessels entering prior to that time, by the second section of an act, passed during the present session of Congress, entitled "An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to report to the House of Representatives, at the next session of Congress, whether any, and, if any, what alterations or modifications are required to be made in the several acts fixing the emoluments of collectors of customs, naval officers, and surveyors.

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following proposition of amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of said States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution:

Congress shall, concurrently with the States, have power to provide for training the militia according to the discipline prescribed for that purpose, and whilst engaged in that service, they shall be subject to the rules and regulations prescribed for the government of the militia when in the military service of the United States, and also to provide for teaching, in the primary schools and other seminaries of learning in the several States, the system of discipline prescribed for the militia.

The said proposition was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARD, of New York, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ John Trumbull, of Connecticut, to compose and execute, in addition to the four paintings which he is already authorized to employ the said Trumbull to compose and execute, commemorative of the most important events of the American Revolution, a painting, the design of which shall be to commemorate the patriotic conduct of Paulding, Williams, and Van Wart, in capturing Major Andre, the British spy, during the American Revolution. This painting, when finished, to be placed in the Capitol of the United States.

The said resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to continue in force the second section of the act entitled "An act, supplementary to an act, to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for furnishing the house of the President of the United States.

The bill to amend and explain the act for designating, surveying, and granting military bounty lands, passed the 6th May, 1812, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, but afterwards indefinitely postponed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on sundry bills referred to the same Committee, which were successively taken up.

Among the other bills before the Committee, was the bill to take away from the pursers and midshipmen in the service of the United States, the half pay now allowed them when not actually employed.

A motion was made to amend the bill by inserting the word "surgeons" after "midshipmen."

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remonstrated most earnestly against the whole of this bill, as tending greatly to the prejudice of the public service, and as proposing, in effect, to turn adrift a great number of youths now in the service, whose continuance was essential to the maintenance of the Navy.

After some conversation respecting proposed modifications of the bill, suggested by Mr. ATHON principally, the bill was, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, ordered to lie on the table.

The bill to transfer the duties of Commissioner of Loans to the Bank of the United States, and to abolish the office of Commissioner of Loans, next passed under review, and was amended.

The Committee then took up the bill which proposes to abolish the present command of the marine corps, and to place the same under the command of a major.

Mr. PLEASANTS, after assigning his reasons therefor, moved to strike out the whole bill, after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof a provision fixing definitely the peace establishment of the marine corps, to consist, from and after the first of April next, of a lieutenant colonel commandant, nine captains, a proportionate number of lieutenants and non-commissioned officers, and seven hundred and fifty privates; the supernumerary officers and soldiers to be discharged from service, with three months' additional pay, as soon as practicable after the first day of April next.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "lieutenant colonel," and in lieu thereof inserting the word "major."

This motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. HARRISON, HUGER, SMITH of Maryland, and PLEASANTS, and was eventually negatived, ayes 40.

The main amendment proposed by Mr. PLEASANTS was then agreed to.

The bill fixing the salary of the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court then came up. The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. HOPKINSON, by inserting a clause limiting the duration of the bill to three years, and then passed on.

The bill appropriating a sum of money for procuring household furniture for the Presidential residence, next came up, and the blank was filled with twenty thousand dollars.

The bill making further appropriations for completing the public buildings in the City of Washington, and for completing the enclosure of the Capitol square followed next. The blank for the first object was filled with one hundred thousand dollars, and that for the latter, with thirty thousand some odd hundred dollars.

Several other bills, noticed below, were also under consideration in Committee.

The Committee rose and reported the several bills they had acted on, by the following titles, viz: A bill to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks and messengers; the bill transferring the duties of Commissioners of Loans to the Bank of the United States, and abolishing the office of Commissioner of Loans; the bill to provide for furnishing the house of the President; the bill respecting the District Court of the United States in the northern district of New York; the bill repealing the act passed the 22d day of April, 1800, and fixing the command of the marine corps; the bill making further provision for repairing the public buildings and improving the public square; the bill from the Senate "to provide for reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court;" the bill from the Senate "to appoint additional pension agents;" the bill from the Senate "authorizing a subscription for the printing of the tenth volume of public documents;" and the bill to continue in force the second section of the act entitled "an act supplementary to the act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

These bills were severally ordered to be read a third time to-morrow, except the first named, which was laid on the table, but will be resumed to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled, "An act to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvement, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States' share of its dividends, with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of this House.

Another message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled, "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described;" and the bill from this House, entitled, "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817," with amendments, in which bill and amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill, in addition to an act, entitled, "An act for the relief of John Thompson," was read the third time; and, on motion of Mr. Root, postponed indefinitely.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act making provision for the location of the lands reserved by the first article of the treaty of the 9th of August, 1814, between the United States and the Creek nation, to certain chiefs

The bill from the Senate, entitled, "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described," was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole, on the bill of this House, supplementary to an act, entitled, "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant an unappropriated lands within the same.

The amendments proposed by Senate to the bill, entitled, "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1817," were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SABBATH MAILS.

Mr. MILLS, from the committee to which was referred the several petitions from inhabitants of different parts of the United States, praying that the mails may not be transported or opened on Sundays, made a detailed report; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred sundry petitions from different parts of the United States, praying Congress would prohibit by law the transportation and opening of the mail on the Sabbath, ask leave to report—

That they have devoted that attention to the said petitions which the importance of the subject, and the motives which actuated so respectable a portion of their fellow-citizens, seemed to require.

To enable them to decide with more correctness, the committee addressed a note to the Postmaster General, requesting of him information upon the following points, viz :

1. What instructions, if any, have been given by your department to the deputy postmasters of the United States, in regard to the arrival and departure, opening and distribution, of the mail on the Sabbath.

2. Is the mail now transported on the Sabbath over any route where it is not transported every day in the week? If so, please to state over what route, and for what reasons it is thus transported.

3. Would the prohibition of the transportation and opening the mail on the Sabbath essentially impede the arrangements of your department, or injure the public interest?

To these inquiries the Postmaster General returned the following answer, which the committee make a part of their report:

GENERAL POST OFFICE, Feb. 20, 1815.

To the honorable the committee to whom were referred sundry petitions from different parts of the United States, praying that Congress would prohibit by law the transportation and opening of the mail on the Sabbath day.

The first point of your inquiry is, "What instructions, if any, have been given by your department to the postmasters of the United States, in regard to the arrival and departure of the mails at their respective offices on the Sabbath?"

To which I observe, that the ninth section of the "act regulating the Post Office Establishment," directs, that postmasters shall attend every day on which a mail shall arrive at their offices, and at all reasonable hours on every day in the week.

To regulate the operations of postmasters under the above quoted section, and to prevent intrusion on the Sabbath, the following instructions were prescribed:

"At post offices where the mails arrive on Sunday, the office is to be kept open for the delivery of letters, &c., for one hour after the arrival and assorting of the mail; but in case that would interfere with the hours of public worship, then the office is to be kept open for one hour after the usual time of dissolving the meetings, for that purpose."

I will further state, that when a mail is conveyed on the Sabbath, it is to be opened and exchanged at those offices which it may reach in the course of the day. This operation (at the smaller offices) occupies not more than ten or twelve minutes; in some of the larger offices it occupies one hour; and, it is believed, does not considerably interfere with religious exercises, as relating to the postmasters themselves.

Another instruction prescribes, "that if a mail arrives at an office too late for the delivery of letters on Saturday night, the postmaster shall deliver them on Sunday morning at an early hour, as shall not entrench upon the hours devoted to public religious services."

No complaint has reached this department against postmasters for non-observance of those instructions; which, if not strictly adhered to, must be imputable to the urgency of applications or the complaisance of postmasters.

The usage of transporting the mail on the Sabbath, is coeval with the Government under the present Constitution of the United States, though the practice of delivering letters on the Sabbath is of more recent origin, and commenced in 1810, by virtue of the aforesaid ninth section, and the above recited instructions emanating therefrom.

The second point of inquiry is, whether, "is the mail transported on the Sabbath along any route where it is not transported every day in the week; if so, where are those routes, and for what reasons is it thus transported?"

To which it is replied, that in forming arrangements, and fixing times for the arrivals and departures of the mails on the lesser and cross routes, care is taken to avoid the transport of the mail on the Sabbath, except where the omission to transport on that day would break chains of communications, producing great delays to public and private intercourse; and it is the mutual desire of the contractor and the department to avoid running the mail on the Sabbath.

The third point of your inquiry is, "would the prohibition of the transportation and opening the mail on the Sabbath essentially impede the arrangements of your department, or injure the interests of the public?"

As precursory to my reply to the third point, it is to be considered that the mail now passes every day in the week, from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to Savannah, in Georgia, without resting on the Sabbath; and the same practice prevails on the two great routes from Washington City to Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois Territory, and Missouri Territory; from this city to Tennessee, Mississippi, Kentucky, to New Orleans; from Charleston to Tennessee and Kentucky, and on several great chains of communication. If the mails were not to move on the Sabbath, on the first mentioned routes, it would be delayed from three to four days in passing from one end of the route to the other; from Washington City to New Orleans, three days; from Boston to New Orleans, four and five days; and generally the mail on the great routes, would, on an average, be detained one-seventh part of the time now employed.

The following will serve as an example of delay to the weekly mails carried on horseback. The mail is carried from Baltimore to Washington City in a stage; and thence to the mouth of the Potomac on horseback. By travelling one Sunday, there is half a day allowed in Baltimore for answering letters; but if the horse mail did not travel on Sunday, an answer to letters would be delayed a whole week.

The compensation for carrying the mail in stages is but a partial benefit to contractors; the principal one arises from the transport of passengers. If the stages which carry the mail cannot proceed on the Sabbath, passengers will not enter those stages; of course the stage proprietors, who offer for the carriage of the mail, will rise in their demands according to the deduction of receipts which shall be occasioned by loss of passengers; for those rival stages which run every day, will be resorted to; even foreign agents would outstep the Government, and obtain advantages beyond its own establishments of communication. Added to this enhanced expense of transport, would be the loss of postage that would occur from a practice, which would inevitably follow, of sending letters by passengers in those stages which run daily. This practice, of sending by passengers, prevailed in a considerable degree during the existence of the law which added fifty per centum on former postages.

A prohibition to transport the mail on the Sabbath would disorder the whole system of transportation on more than seven hundred routes.

The population of the United States is widely extended; the greater the territorial extent of any Government, the greater must be the necessity for celerity and frequency of its intercourse.

If it be considered necessary that Governmental despatches be transmitted on the Sabbath, it may then be observed, that as far as such transmission is beneficial to the nation, by preserving or improving its condition, so far has it a tendency to the conservation and the protection of the great community, in the enjoyment of religious as well as civil liberty; and enabling it to enjoy, in safety and in quietude, the benefits diffused from a due observance of the Sabbath.

The contents of mails are not confined to public despatches, nor to subjects of private business or pleasure; the same mail which transports such, equally accelerates supplies to want—consolation to affliction—and to piety, evangelical correspondence; and thus performing works of charity, it may be considered as doing good on the Sabbath day.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. J. MEIGS, Jun.

In addition to the foregoing letter, the committee beg leave to observe that they cordially agree with the petitioners in the importance of a religious observance of the Christian Sabbath—an institution calculated to afford an opportunity for relaxation from labor and worldly cares; for reflection upon serious and moral subjects; for devout adoration of the Creator and Governor of the world; for acts of charity and benevolence; and for the exercise and improvement of all those virtues which adorn the nature and contribute to the happiness of man. To the State governments, however, and not to the Government of the United States, belongs the power, as far as the rights of conscience, and the provisions of their respective constitutions will permit, of establishing and supporting such institutions as are calculated to enlighten the understanding and correct the heart, by inculcating and diffusing among the people the great principles of piety, religion, and morality, and of passing and enforcing laws to prevent the profanation of the Sabbath.

The power "to establish post offices and post roads" is, by the Constitution of the United States, exclusively vested in Congress; and the transportation and distribution of the mail, at such times and under such circumstances as the public interest may require, is necessarily incident to that power.

In regulating an establishment of so much importance to the country, Congress have, by law, enjoined it upon the Postmaster General, "to provide for the carriage of the mail on all post roads that are or may be established by law; and as often as he, having regard to the productiveness thereof and other circumstances, shall think proper." In pursuance of this authority, it has been the invariable practice of that department, ever since the establishment of the General Government, to provide for the transportation of the mail upon every day of the week, along the great and important routes through and across the country. If in the early period of our political existence such an arrangement was found necessary, the great increase of wealth, population, and territory which have since taken place, in the opinion of the committee, demand its continuance.

In a country so extensive, and whose citizens are united by so many ties of friendship and consanguinity, as well as of business and policy, the convenience of the people and the exigencies of Government alike require that every reasonable facility should be furnished for the intercourse and communication of its different parts.

Under such circumstances, the petitioners themselves must admit that travelling upon the Sabbath is not only excusable, but an act of duty. And the committee cannot doubt that, along the chain of communication from one extremity of the Union to the other, through places of great wealth and business, and a dense population, the facility of communication furnished by the mail prevents, in numerous instances, the doing of that which, without such facility, would be a "work of necessity or charity."

Many of the evils stated by the petitioners are not necessarily incident to the practice of which they complain. The transportation of the mail upon the Sabbath, by the agent of the Government, furnishes no justification to the traveller who unnecessarily fixes upon that day to perform his journey in the public stage, nor does the delivery of letters at the respective, post offices justify the assemblage of a concourse of people at such offices on that day. These evils if they exist, it is perfectly within the power of the several State governments to correct.

Claims' Law.

But as the practice of travelling on the Sabbath is tolerated by the State governments in at least three-fourths of the Union, the prohibition of the transportation of the mail on that day, would have no other effect than to transfer to private hands that communication from place to place which is now performed by the Government; stage coaches and expresses would supply the place of the mail; if, for example, the mail should not pass on the Sabbath between New York and Philadelphia, or between Philadelphia and Baltimore, there being no laws to prohibit any other communication between those places on that day, the citizens of those large commercial cities would still maintain their daily intercourse with each other, by such private conveyance as they could employ. This would put upon the road, as agents, expresses, and private contractors, many more persons and carriages than are now employed in the transportation of the mail. Until, therefore, the prohibition of travelling on the Sabbath, by the several State governments, shall have become in some degree general, a law to stop the mail on that day would rather increase than diminish the evil of which the petitioners complain.

In the opinion which the committee have formed upon this subject, they have not been influenced by any considerations of economy in the transportation of the mail, though that is alluded to in the letter of the Postmaster General, but by a sincere belief that in the present situation of the State laws, and under proper regulations, the practice is as consistent with the requirements of the moral law, as it is with a sound and enlightened policy.

But although the committee believe it necessary to continue the transportation of the mail, they do not perceive that the same necessity exists for the delivery of letters at the respective post offices on the Sabbath. They therefore report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to pass any law respecting the transportation of the mail.

Resolved, That provision be made, by law, to prohibit the delivery of letters at the respective post offices of the United States on the Sabbath.

CLAIMS' LAW.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill sent from this House, to amend the claims' law of last session; which amendments go to change altogether the character of the bill.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of Claims were rejected by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky to amend the Senate's amendments by inserting in lieu of them the bill (discussed in this House the other day, but laid on the table and not since taken up) for the relief of the sufferers on the Niagara frontier.

The amendments are as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to remunerate the inhabitants of the Niagara frontier, in the State of New York, for property destroyed by the enemy during the invasion of that frontier between the eighteenth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirteen, and the second day of January, eighteen hundred and fourteen, both inclusive.

"And be it further enacted, That no person shall be entitled to the benefits of the appropriation in the preceding section who was not either an inhabitant of the said Niagara frontier at the time of the declaration of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, or the actual owner and proprietor of some house or building destroyed by the enemy during the invasion aforesaid, or an inhabitant of the said frontier who had removed there since the war, with a view to make a fixed and permanent settlement there.

"And be it further enacted, That no person who shall have received any moneys from the Treasury of the United States, for property destroyed during the invasion aforesaid, in virtue of the ninth section of the act heroby amended, shall be entitled to relief under this act for any other or further losses, unless he shall, within five days after the first public meeting of the Commissioners hereinafter mentioned, pay into the hands of said Commissioners the whole of the sum or sums received by him as aforesaid; and in case of his so refunding, he shall enjoy in relation to the whole of his losses all the right and benefit of the present law, in the same manner as if he had not presented his claim under the said law of the ninth of April last; and any sum or sums which may come into the hands of the said Commissioners, in compliance with the provisions of this section, shall be by them paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall form an additional fund to the said two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and is heroby appropriated to the same object.

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, as soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this act, to appoint three Commissioners, who shall immediately proceed to the Niagara frontier and examine and ascertain, by the best evidence that the nature of the case will admit of, the value of the several buildings destroyed by the enemy during the invasion aforesaid, and also the value of all other property destroyed in the said buildings, and belonging to such persons as are entitled to relief by the provisions of this act; and shall also ascertain, either by the oath of the respective claimants, or such other evidence as may be satisfactory to them, the amount which the said claimants may have respectively received of a certain donation of fifty thousand dollars granted by the Legislature of the State of New York, in the year eighteen hundred and fourteen, to the sufferers on the Niagara frontier; and, after completing the said examination, the said Commissioners shall forthwith report to the Secretary of War the names of the sufferers entitled to the benefits of this act and the amount of their respective losses.

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be the further duty of the Secretary of War, on the receipt of the aforesaid report, to cause the moneys appropriated by this act to be divided and paid on their respective applications to the several persons intended to be relieved by this act, in proportion to the amount of their losses respectively sustained by them and reported by the Commissioners, after deducting from the amount of such losses the sums which the claimants have respectively received of the said donation from the State of New York: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall authorize the payment to any person of a greater sum than the amount of his losses as reported by the Commissioners.

"And be it further enacted, That no person shall be entitled to receive any payment or compensation under the act hereby amended, for any losses, for which provision is made either wholly, or in part, by this act.

"And be it further enacted, That in case of the decease of any person, who, if living, would be entitled to the benefits of this act, the sum awarded by the Secretary of War, shall be paid to his legal representatives.

"And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners to be appointed in pursuance of this act, shall, before they enter upon their duties, take and subscribe an oath to perform those duties faithfully and honestly; and they shall have power to administer oaths to the witnesses offered for examination before them; and for their services they shall be allowed at the rate of four dollars per day for the time they shall be actually employed, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

A motion was then made by Mr. CANNON to lay the bill on the table; which motion was disagreed to by the House.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. JOHNSON, and determined in the negative.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, then moved further to amend the said amendments by inserting the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner be, and he is hereby, directed to award indemnification to such persons who have sustained damage or loss by the destruction of their houses or buildings by the enemy on the Niagara frontier, between the eighth day of December, eighteen hundred and thirteen, and the third day of January, eighteen hundred and fourteen: Provided, It shall be proved that the houses so destroyed, and for which indemnification is claimed, were in the military occupation of the United States as barracks or storehouses at the time of such destruction, and destroyed in consequence thereof: And provided also, That no decision made by the said Commissioner, under this section, shall entitle the claimant or claimants to indemnification, unless such decision shall first receive the approbation and sanction of the Secretary of War."

And the question being taken on inserting the said section, it was determined in the negative.

Another motion was then made by Mr. CLARK, of New York, further to amend the said amendments by striking out the first section thereof, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"That all decisions made by the Commissioner, under the act to which this is an amendment, shall be revised and approved by the Secretary of War, before payment shall be made thereon."

And the question being taken thereon, it was also determined in the negative.

The said amendments of the Senate were then concurred in by the House as amended.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge, as a permanent fund for internal improvement, the bonus of the National Bank, and the United States' share of its dividends," were read; when a motion was made by Mr. H. NELSON, that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; and, the ques-

On motion of Mr. MILLS, it was Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon. HENRY CLAY for the ability and impartiality with which he has presided over its deliberations, and the correctness with which he has performed the arduous and important duties of the chair.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills from this House of the following titles, to wit:

An act making provision for the location of the lands reserved by the first article of the treaty of the 9th of August, 1814, between the United States and the Creek Indians, to certain chiefs and warriors of that nation, and for other purposes;

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks within the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of unchartered associations within the said District," reported the same without amendment.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill, when Mr. WEBSTER moved to strike out the 28th section thereof; which motion was rejected by the House.

Another motion was then made by Mr. WEBSTER, to amend the said bill by striking out from the 7th line of the first section the words "thirty-six," so as to leave blank the year to which it is proposed to extend the charters of the said banks, which motion was also rejected by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. INGHAM to add to the 30th section the following:

"And the several sums directed to be paid by the banking companies hereby incorporated to any company now incorporated, shall constitute a portion of the stock of such companies; and the proceeds of the dividends of such stock shall be disposed of as Congress may hereafter direct for like purposes."

And the question was stated to agree to the amendment, when a member called for the reading of the bill; which being objected to, the SPEAKER declared that, at this stage of its progress, it was not competent for one member to demand the reading of the bill without an order of the House:—from which decision of the Speaker, Mr. BASSETT appealed to the House; and on the question—"Is the decision of the Speaker correct?" it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. INGHAM then moved that the bill be read; which motion was rejected by the House.

The question was then taken on the amendment moved by Mr. INGHAM, and was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was then amended and recommitted to a select committee. And Messrs. LEWIS, GASTON, and TAYLOR, of New York, were appointed the committee, with leave to sit during the session of the House.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee to which the said bill was recommitted, reported the same with amendments, which the House proceeded to consider, when Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely.

Adams, Barbour, Bassett, Bennett, Birdseye, Boss, Bradbury, Brooks, Calhoun, Carr of Massachusetts, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Condict, Deasha, Edwards, Griffin, Hahn, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Hopkinson, Ingham, Johnson of Virginia, King, Langdon, Law, Little, Lowndes, Lyle, Wm. The said amendments were then concurred in by the House; and the bill was further amended, and the amendments ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time to-day, which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

VETO OF INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT BILL.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Todd, his Secretary, who, by command of the President, returned to the House the bill passed by the two Houses, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements," and presented to the President for his approbation and signature, this day, to which bill the President having made objections, the same were also delivered in by the said Secretary; who then withdrew.

The said objections were read, and are as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Having considered the bill this day presented to me, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements," and which sets apart and pledges funds "for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water-courses in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defence;" I am constrained, by the insuperable difficulty I feel in reconciling the bill with the Constitution of the United States, to return it with that objection, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated.

The legislative powers vested in Congress are specified and enumerated in the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution; and it does not appear that the power proposed to be exercised by the bill is among the enumerated powers; or that it falls, by any just interpretation, within the power to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution those or other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.

"The power to regulate commerce among the several States," cannot include a power to construct roads and canals, and to improve the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce, without a latitude of construction departing from the ordinary import of the terms, strengthened by the known inconveniences which doubtless led to the grant of this remedial power to Congress.

To refer the power in question to the clause "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," would be contrary to the established and consistent rules of interpretation; as rendering the special and careful enumeration of powers, which follow the clause, nugatory and improper. Such a view of the Constitution would have the effect of giving to Congress a general power of legislation, instead of the defined and limited one hitherto understood to belong to them; the terms "common defence and general welfare" embracing every object and act within the purview of a legislative trust. It would have the effect of subjecting both the Constitution and laws of the several States, in all cases not specifically exempted, to be superseded by laws of Congress; it being expressly declared "that the Constitution of the United States, and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Such a view of the Constitution, finally, would have the effect of excluding the judicial authority of the United States from its participation in guarding the boundary between the legislative powers of the General and the State Governments; inasmuch as questions relating to the general welfare being questions of policy and expediency, are unsuited to judicial cognizance and decision.

A restriction of the power "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money, would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of Government; money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution.

If a general power to construct roads and canals, and to improve the navigation of water-courses, with the train of powers incident thereto, be not possessed by Congress, the assent of the States in the mode provided in the bill cannot confer the power. The only cases in which the consent and cession of particular States can extend the power of Congress, are those specified and provided for in the Constitution.

I am not unaware of the great importance of roads and canals, and the improved navigation of water-courses; and that a power in the National Legislature to provide for them might be exercised with signal advantage to the general prosperity. But seeing that such a power is not expressly given by the Constitution; and believing that it cannot be deduced from any part of it without an inadmissible latitude of construction, and a reliance on insufficient precedents; believing also that the permanent success of the Constitution depends on a definite partition of powers between the General and State Government, and that no adequate landmarks would be left by the constructive extension of the powers of Congress, as proposed in the bill, I have no option but to withhold my signature from it; and to cherishing the hope that its beneficial objects may be attained by a resort for the necessary powers, to the same wisdom and virtue in the nation which established the Constitution in its actual form, and providently marked out, in the instrument itself, a safe and practicable mode of improving it, as experience might suggest.

JAMES MADISON.

MARCH 3, 1817.

The House proceeded to the reconsideration of the said bill, which is in the following words:

An Act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvement.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the sum to be paid to the United States by the twentieth section of the "act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the dividends which shall arise from their shares in its capital stock, during the present term of twenty years, for which the proprietors thereof have been incorporated, be, and the same are hereby, set apart and pledged as a fund for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for their common defence.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the moneys constituting the said fund shall, from time to time, be applied in constructing such roads or canals or in improving the navigation of such water-courses, or both, in each State, as Congress, with the assent of such State, shall by law direct, and in the manner most conducive to the general welfare; and the proportion of the said moneys to be expended on the objects aforesaid, in each State, shall be in the ratio of its representation, at the time of the apportionment hereinafter provided, in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature: Provided, That the proportion of said fund, to be assigned to any State, or any part thereof, may, by the assent of such State, be applied to the purposes aforesaid in any other State.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said fund be put under the care of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being; and that it shall be his duty to apportion and divide the said fund, as it annually accrues, among the several States now existing, and such as may hereafter be admitted into the Union, according to the then existing ratio of representation as before directed; and to invest the same, so apportioned and divided, in the funded debt of the United States in the names of the respective States; and the funded debt so set apart in the names of the respective States shall be applied to the aforesaid objects, under the concurrent direction of Congress, and the Legislature of the State interested; and he shall also lay before Congress, at their annual session, the condition of the said fund.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said Secretary, unless otherwise directed, to vest the sum to be paid to the United States, by the twentieth section of the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States, as it may fall due, in the stock of the United States; and also to lay before Congress, at their annual session, the condition of said fund.

Attest: H. CLAY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN GAILLARD,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the House of Representatives.

TH. DOUGHERTY,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The question was then taken in the mode prescribed in the Constitution of the United States, "that the House, on reconsideration, do agree to pass the said bill," the President's objections to the same to the contrary notwithstanding.

And determined in the negative—yeas 60, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, (Speaker,) Alexander, Archer, Betts, Birdseye, Breckenridge, Brooks, Cady, Calhoun, Chappell, Clondennin, Comstock, Connor, Orighton, Culpeper, Forsyth, Gaston, Griffin, Hahn, Hall, Harrison, Henderson, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Kent, Kerr of Virginia, Kilbourn, Little, Lovett, Lytle, Middleton, Milnor, Jeremiah Nelson, Ormaby, Peter, Pickering, Reynolds, Ross, Savage, Schenck, Sharp, Sheffield, Tate, Taylor of New York, Telfair, Wallace, Webster, Wendover, Whitesides, Wilde, Wilkin, Thos. Wilson, Wm. Wilson, Yancey, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atherton, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Carr of Massachusetts, Clarke of North Carolina, Clayton, Davenport, Dusha, Dickens, Edwards, Fletcher, Forney, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Hale, Hawes, Hungerford, Irwin of Pennsylvania, Jewett, Johnson of Virginia, King, Law, Lowmides, Lyon, William Maclay, Marsh, Mason, McCoy, Mills, Hugh Nelson, Noyes, Parris, Pitkin, Pleasants, Reed, Root, Ruggles, Smith of Maryland, Southard, Stearns, Strong, Sturges, Tallmadge, Taul, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New York, Ward of New Jersey, Wilcox, and Williams.

And so the said bill was rejected.

[It will be observed that the Speaker, on this occasion, differing from every other question before the House, claimed and exercised the right to vote. Two-thirds being required to decide the question affirmatively, the bill did not pass.]

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. WILDE moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the bill for establishing a National University, and to postpone it indefinitely, prefacing his motion with the following remarks:

Mr. W. had seized, he said, the momentary interval of leisure they then possessed, for the purpose of submitting a motion, which as it was the last he should ever have the honor of making in that House, so it would be, as it regarded its subject, the only successful one he had ever made. At the commencement of the session he had the misfortune, for such he esteemed it, to be appointed the chairman of a select committee, to whom was referred a very small and a very unimportant portion of the President's Message; and as that appointment had made it his duty, contrary to his wishes, to trouble the House by the occasional renewal of a most ungrateful motion, on certain orders of the day, he had no doubt the House regretted the misfortune quite as much as he did. Since it had been their pleasure, for reasons no doubt satisfactory to themselves, but among which Constitutional scruples could hardly be reckoned as a part, constantly to decline considering the report of that committee whilst consideration was possible; he was not weak enough to suppose they would bestow a thought upon it now, when all further consideration had become useless. The Committee, it was true, had given the subject some portion of their time and attention, and he was sorry both had been so unprofitably employed. What had been painfully wasted in this labor of Sisyphus, if otherwise directed might have proved humbly useful. He said painfully, because hopelessly; he had long known that success was not even doubtful. The measure, if indeed it were a good one, had fallen upon evil times and into inauspicious hands.

He hoped he was not thought querulous in these remarks; he disclaimed most unequivocally all intention of being so. He knew it was the usual fortune of complaint to excite contempt more than pity, and he trusted he was not, that he did not wish to make himself the object of either.

You, sir, said he to the Speaker, can bear me witness, that if this subject has been thrust or dragged into the discussion of other topics, it was not by me. I did not so much as reply, when it was invoked, certainly not by the inspiration of Minerva, as an argument against the whiskey tax—he did not mean to say it was by any other inspiration, least of all, that of the giver of the vine, whom Horace styled a modest and a candid god; he would not do injustice even to a heathen deity; and the ancient mythology furnished no allusion to that process which converted man's food into his poison, unless indeed it was the crime by which the daughter of Ceres became the wife of Pluto and the queen of those dominions which he should not designate. He had seen no necessity to say a word, when this bill had been introduced into the discussion of other measures, (and into the discussion of what measure of domestic policy had it not been introduced?) because he could always say what he thought his duty required, by speaking upon every question, on which he did speak at all, if not to the purpose at least to the point.

He now moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration, not the further consideration, of the bill for establishing a National University, and that the bill itself be indefinitely postponed.

This motion was made in perfect good humor, and in most perfect good faith; by no means with any intention of voting for one-half of it and against the other. He was under a very strong conviction that it would succeed. Certainly it ought. The measure had long been more than civiliter mortuus. He feared it had even become offensive to the economical sensibilities of the House. It was therefore, high time it should be interred—not with obituary honors, of which it was in no wise worthy—but with the bare common decencies of Christian burial. May it rest in peace. Let no one disturb its ashes. He did not mean to speak its funeral oration, and for a hic jacet, the message they had just received would do as well as any other. Future politicians might read it, and, reading might, moralize on the uncertainty of all things—not excepting Executive recommendations. One good, he trusted would result, if not to them, at all events to their successors, from meditating among the tombs of National Education and Internal Improvement. They would learn in what not to put their trust. They would listen, a little less seriously, to those noble and captivating projects which others heretofore have had the merit of proposing, and that House the odium of rejecting. They would learn to distinguish those things which were intended for Congress, from those, if there were any such, which were intended only for the people.

Perhaps also, that inversion of the usual order of responsibility which they had just witnessed, might have its use elsewhere. The latter class of propositions might hereafter, as he hoped they would, altogether cease. At least they must be advanced more cautiously. And if they were not, he trusted that House would take a proper occasion, respectfully, but distinctly, to intimate their consciousness, that in official, as in social intercourse, without the slightest breach of the purest morality, there may be uttered an infinite number of delightful nothings, which, though very sweet to the ear, and very pretty on the lips, either have no meaning at all, or may be taken to mean anything.

[The Committee were accordingly discharged.]

An adjournment being moved and seconded—

Mr. Speaker CLAY arose and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: Before I perform the last duty of the presiding officer of the House, I will avail myself of the occasion to make my respectful acknowledgments for the flattering expression of favorable opinion which has been recently made, and which was rendered more interesting by the quarter from which it proceeded. Next to the approbation of one's own conscience, and one's country, that of the immediate representatives of the people must ever be most acceptable. But I feel, that in the instance of that just bestowed on me, I am more indebted to the kindness than to the justice of the House. For I am quite sensible, that in the course of my administration of the duties of the Chair, called upon, as I frequently was, promptly to decide complicated and embarrassing questions, as they suddenly arose, I must have committed many errors. And if I have been able, in any degree, to satisfy the just expectations of the House, it is owing to that liberal support which has been, on all sides, generously accorded me.

In legislation there are three periods of extraordinary difficulty, and requiring great fortitude. The first is that which immediately precedes a war, and in which preparation is made for the event. The second, that which accompanies the war: and the third that which immediately follows the war. During the two first, however, there were animating circumstances always existing, which invigorated the legislative function. During the last, the stimulus is gone, and being replaced by relaxation, the legislator needs a more fortitude. He has to survey the whole fabric of the State; to accommodate it to the new circumstances in which it placed; to provide a revenue for redeeming the debt of the war; to retrench, and, by the reduction of the establishments, to dismis from the service of the country many of those who have nobly contributed to sustain its glory.

It has been your lot, gentleman, to be cast in the last of the three periods mentioned. And I take great pleasure, regardless of the motives which may be ascribed to me, in testifying to the patience, the diligence, and the zeal which you have manifested in the public service. I am greatly deceived if, as the result of your labors, at no distant day, there will not be acknowledged to have been laid by you, the deepest foundations of the national prosperity. That you may long continue to live to witness and to participate in that prosperity; and that you may experience, on your return to your respective homes, every blessing of which our nature is susceptible, is the ardent wish of one, who, wherever he may be, will never cease to cherish of all of you, the most agreeable and affectionate recollections.

It remains for me only to announce, that this House stands adjourned sine die.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE FOURTEENTH CONGRESS.

[SECOND SESSION.]

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 13, 1816.]
To the Senate of the United States :

A Treaty of Commerce between the United States and the King of Sweden and Norway having been concluded and signed on the 4th of September last by their Plenipotentiaries, I lay the same before the Senate for their consideration and advice as to a ratification.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13, 1816.

In the name of the most Holy and Indivisible Trinity :

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, equally animated with a sincere desire to maintain and confirm the relations of friendship and commerce which have hitherto subsisted between the two States, and being convinced that this object cannot be more effectually accomplished than by establishing, reciprocally, commerce between the two States upon the firm basis of liberal and equitable principles, equally advantageous to both countries, have named to this end Plenipotentiaries, and have furnished them with the necessary full powers to treat, and, in their name, to conclude a treaty, to wit: The President of the United States Jonathan Russell, a citizen of the said United States, and now their Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Stockholm; and His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway His Excellency the Count Laurent d'Engestrom, his Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, Chancellor of the University of Lund, knight commander of the orders of the King, knight of the orders of St. Charles XIII., grand cross of the orders of St. Etienne of Hungary, of the Legion of Honor of France, of the Black Eagle and of the Red Eagle of Prussia; and the Count Adolphe George de Morner, his Counsellor of State, and commander of the order of the Polar Star; and the said Plenipotentiaries, after having produced and exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be between all the territories under the dominion of the United States of America and of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of either of the two countries shall have liberty, with all security for their persons, vessels, and cargoes, to come freely to all ports, places, and rivers within the territories of the other, into which the vessels of the most favored nations are permitted to enter. They can there remain and reside in any part whatsoever of the said territories; they can there hire and occupy houses and warehouses for their commerce; and, generally, the merchants and traders of each of the two nations shall enjoy in the other the most complete security and protection for the transaction of their business, being bound alone to conform to the laws and statutes of the two countries, respectively.

ART. 2. No other or higher duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway of the produce or manufactures of the United States, nor on the importation into the United States of the produce or manufactures of territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, than those to which the same articles would be subjected in each of the two countries, respectively, if these articles were the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other country. The same principle shall likewise be observed in respect to exportation in such manner, that in each of the two countries, respectively, the articles which shall be exported for the other cannot be charged with any duty, impost, or charge whatsoever, higher or other than those to which the same articles would be subjected if they were exported to any other country whatever.

Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or of the United States, to or from the said territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

Treaty with Sweden and Norway.

Swedish or Norwegian vessels arriving in ballast, or importing into the United States the produce or manufactures of their country, or exporting from the United States the produce or manufactures of said States, shall not be obliged to pay, either for the vessels or cargoes, any other or higher duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, than those which the vessels of the United States would pay in the same circumstances; and, vice versa, the vessels of the United States arriving in ballast, or importing into the territories under the dominion of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway the produce or manufactures of the United States, or exporting from the territories under the dominion of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway the produce or manufactures of these territories, shall not pay, either for the vessels or the cargoes, any other or higher duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, than those which would be paid if these articles were transported by Swedish or Norwegian vessels, respectively.

That which is here above stipulated shall also extend to the Swedish colony of St. Bartholomew, as well in what relates to the rights and advantages which the vessels of the United States shall enjoy in its ports, as in relation to those which the vessels of the colony shall enjoy in the ports of the United States; provided the owners are inhabitants of St. Bartholomew, are there established and naturalized, and shall have there caused their vessels to be naturalized.

ART. 3. His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway agrees that all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the West Indies, which are permitted to be imported in Swedish or Norwegian vessels, whether these articles be imported directly or indirectly from the said Indies, may likewise be imported into its territories in vessels of the United States; and there shall not be paid, either for said vessels or the cargoes, any higher or other duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever than those which would be paid by Swedish or Norwegian vessels in the same circumstances, with an addition only of ten per centum on the said duties, imposts, and charges, and no more.

In order to avoid misapprehension in this respect, it is expressly declared that the term "West Indies" ought to be taken in its most extensive sense, comprising all that portion of the earth, whether main land or islands, which at any time has been denominated the West Indies, in contradistinction to that other portion of the earth denominated the East Indies.

ART. 4. The United States of America, on their part, agree that all articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the countries surrounding the Baltic sea, or bordering thereon, which are permitted to be imported in vessels of the United States, whether these articles be imported directly or indirectly from the Baltic, may likewise be imported into the United States in Swedish or Norwegian vessels; and there shall not then be paid for the said vessels, or for the cargoes, any higher or other duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, than those which would be paid by vessels of the United States in the same circumstances, with an addition only of ten per centum on the said duties, imposts, and charges, and no more.

In order to avoid all uncertainty in respect to the duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever which a vessel belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties ought to pay, on arriving in the ports of the other with a cargo consisting partly of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the country to which the vessel belongs, and partly of any other merchandise, which the said vessel is permitted to import by the preceding articles, it is agreed, that in case a cargo should be thus mixed, the vessel shall always pay duties, imposts, and charges, according to the nature of that part of the cargo which is subjected to the highest duties, in the same manner as if the vessel imported this sort of merchandise only.

ART. 5. The high contracting parties grant mutually the liberty of having, in the places of commerce and ports of the other, consuls, vice-consuls, or commercial agents, who shall enjoy all the protection and assistance necessary for the due discharge of their functions. But it is here expressly declared that, in case of illegal or improper conduct in respect to the laws or government of the country to which they are sent, the said consul, vice-consul, or agent, may be either punished according to law, dismissed, or sent away by the offended Government, that Government assigning to the other the reasons therefor. It is, nevertheless, understood that the archives and documents relative to the affairs of the consulate shall be protected from all examination, and shall be carefully preserved, being placed under the seal of the consul and of the authority of the place where he shall have resided.

The consuls or their deputies shall have the right, as such, to act as judges and arbitrators in the differences which may arise between the captains and crews of the vessels of the nation whose affairs are intrusted to their care. The respective Governments shall have no right to interfere in matters of this kind, except the conduct of the captain and crew shall disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country in which the vessel may be, or that the consul of the place shall feel himself obliged to resort to the interposition and support of the executive authority to cause his decision to be respected and maintained; it being, nevertheless, understood that this kind of judgment or award shall not deprive the contending parties of the right which they shall have, on their return, to recur to the judicial authorities of their own country.

ART. 6. In order to prevent all dispute and uncertainty in respect to what may be considered as being the growth, produce, and manufacture of the contracting parties, respectively, it is agreed, that whatever the chief or intendant of the customs shall have designated and specified as such, in the clearance delivered to the vessels which depart from the European ports of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, shall be acknowledged and admitted as such in the United States; and that, in the same manner, whatever the chief or collector of the customs in the ports of the United States shall have designated and specified as the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, shall be acknowledged and admitted as such in the territories of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway.

The specification or designation given by the chief of the customs in the colonies of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, and confirmed by the governor of the colony, shall be considered as sufficient proof of the origin of the articles thus specified or designated, to obtain for them admission into the ports of the United States accordingly.

ART. 7. The citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties, arriving with their vessels on any coast belonging to the other, but not willing to enter into port, or, being entered into port, and not willing to unload or break bulk, shall have liberty to depart, and to pursue their voyage without molestation, and without being obliged to render account of their cargo, or to pay any duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever on the vessels or cargo, excepting only the dues of pilotage, (when a pilot shall have been employed,) or those of quayage, or light money, whenever those dues are paid in the same circumstances by the citizens or subjects of the country. It being, nevertheless, understood, that whenever the vessels belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties shall be within the jurisdiction of the other, they shall conform to the laws and regulations concerning navigation, and the places and ports into which they may be permitted to enter, which are in force with regard to the citizens or subjects of the country; and it shall be lawful for the officers of the customs, in the district where the said vessels may be, to visit them, to remain on board, and to take such precautions as may be necessary to prevent all illicit commerce while such vessels remain within the said jurisdiction.

ART. 8. It is also agreed, that the vessels of one of the contracting parties, entering the ports of the other, shall be permitted to discharge a part only of their cargoes, whenever the captain or owner shall desire so to do, and they shall be allowed to depart freely with the remainder, without paying any duties, imposts, or charges whatsoever, except on that part which shall have been landed, and which shall be marked and noted on the list or manifest containing the enumeration of the merchandise which the vessel ought to have on board, and which list ought always to be presented, without reservation, to the officers of the customs at the place where the vessel shall have arrived; and nothing shall be paid on the part of the cargo which the vessels take away; and the said vessel may proceed therewith to any other port or ports in the same country, into which vessels of the most favored nations are permitted to enter, and there dispose of the same; or the said vessel may depart therewith to the ports of any other country. It is, however, understood, that the duties, imposts, or charges, which are payable on the vessel itself, ought to be paid at the first port where it breaks bulk and discharges a part of the cargo, and that no such duties or impositions shall be again demanded in the ports of the same country where the said vessel may thereafter enter, except the inhabitants of the country be subjected to further duties in the same circumstances.

ART. 9. The citizens or subjects of one of the contracting parties shall enjoy in the ports of the other, as well for their vessels as for their merchandise, all the rights and privileges of entrepot which are enjoyed by the most favored nations in the same ports.

ART. 10. In case any vessel belonging to either of the two States, or to their citizens or subjects, shall be stranded, shipwrecked, or have suffered any other damage on the coasts under the dominion of either of the parties, all aid and assistance shall be given to the persons shipwrecked, or who may be in danger thereof, and passports shall be granted them to return to their own country. The ships and merchandise wrecked, or the proceeds thereof, if the effects be sold, being claimed in a year and a day by the owners or their attorney, shall be restored, on paying the same costs of salvage, conformably to the laws and usages of the two nations, which the citizens or subjects of the country would pay in the same circumstances. The respective Governments shall watch over the companies which are or may be instituted for saving shipwrecked persons and property, that vexations and abuses may not take place.

ART. 11. It is agreed that vessels arriving direct from the United States at a port under the dominion of His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, or from the ports of his said Majesty in Europe at a port of the United States, furnished with a certificate of health from the competent health officer of the port whence they took their departure, certifying that no malignant or contagious disease existed at that port, shall not be subjected to any other quarantine than such as shall be necessary for the visit of the health officer of the port at which they may have arrived; but shall, after such visit, be permitted immediately to enter and discharge their cargoes: Provided, always, That there may not be found any person on board who has been, during the voyage, afflicted with a malignant or contagious disease, and that the country from which the vessel comes may not be so generally regarded at the time as infected or suspected that it has been previously necessary to issue a regulation by which all vessels coming from that country are regarded as suspected, and subjected to quarantine.

ART. 12. The Treaty of Amity and Commerce concluded at Paris, in 1783, by the Plenipotentiaries of the United States and of His Majesty the King of Sweden, is renewed and put in force by the present treaty, in respect to all which is contained in the second, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fifth articles of the said treaty, as well as the separate articles one, two, four, and five, which were signed the same day by the same Plenipotentiaries; and the articles specified shall be considered to have as full force and vigor as if they were inserted word for word: Provided, nevertheless, That the stipulations contained in the articles above mentioned shall always be considered as making no change in the conventions previously concluded with other friendly and allied nations.

ART. 13. Considering the distance of the respective countries of the two high contracting parties, and the uncertainty that results therefrom in relation to the various events which may take place, it is agreed that a merchant vessel belonging to one of the contracting parties, and destined to a port supposed to be blockaded at the time of her departure, shall not, however, be captured or condemned for having a first time attempted to enter the said port, unless it may be proved that the said vessel could and ought to have learned, on her passage, that the place in question continued to be in a state of blockade; but vessels which, after having been once turned away, shall attempt a second time, during the same voyage, to enter the same port of the enemy, while the blockade continues, shall be liable to detention and condemnation.

ART. 14. The present treaty, when the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, shall continue in force, and be obligatory on the United States and His Majesty the King of Sweden and Norway, for the term of eight years from the exchange of the ratifications; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in eight months from the signature of this treaty, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, and have thereunto set the seal of their arms. Done at Stockholm, the fourth day of September, in the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

NEUTRAL OBLIGATIONS.

[Communicated to Congress, December 26, 1816.]
To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

It is found that the existing laws have not the efficacy necessary to prevent violations of the obligations of the United States as a nation at peace towards belligerent parties, and other unlawful acts on the high seas, by armed vessels equipped within the waters of the United States.

With a view to maintain more effectually the respect due to the laws, to the character, and to the neutral and pacific relations of the United States, I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of such further legislative provisions as may be requisite for detaining vessels actually equipped, or in a course of equipment, with a warlike force, within the jurisdiction of the United States; or, as the case may be, for obtaining from the owners or commanders of such vessels adequate securities against the abuse of their armaments, with the exceptions in such provisions proper for the cases of merchant vessels furnished with the defensive armaments usual on distant and dangerous expeditions, and of a private commerce in military stores permitted by our laws, and which the law of nations does not require the United States to prohibit.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 26, 1816.

[The following documents, relating to the subject referred to in the above Message, were laid before the House of Representatives, by Mr. Forsyth, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.]

Mr. Forsyth to the Secretary of State.

JANUARY 1, 1817.

SIR: I am instructed by the Committee of Foreign Relations to inquire what information has been given to the Department of State of violations, or intended violations, of the neutral obligations of the United States to foreign Powers, by the arming and equipment of vessels of war in our ports; what prosecutions have been commenced under the existing laws to prevent the commission of such offences; what persons prosecuted have been discharged, in consequence of the defects of the laws now in force; and the particular provisions that have been found insufficient, or for the want of which persons deserving punishment have escaped.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN FORSYTH,

Chairman Com. Foreign Relations.

HON. JAMES MONROE.

Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 6, 1817.

SIR: Having communicated to you, verbally, the information asked for by your letter of the 1st instant, except so far as relates to the last inquiry it contains, I have now the honor to state, that the provisions necessary to make the laws effectual against fitting out armed vessels in our ports, for the purpose of hostile cruising, seem to be—

1st. That they should be laid under bond not to violate the treaties of the United States, or the obligations of the United States under the law of nations, in all cases where there is reason to suspect such a purpose on foot, including the cases of vessels taking on board arms and munitions of war, applicable to the equipment and armament of such vessels, subsequent to their departure.

2d. To invest the collectors, or other revenue officers where there are no collectors, with power to seize and detain vessels under circumstances indicating strong presumption of an intended breach of the law: the detention to take place until the order of the Executive, on a full representation of the facts had thereupon, can be obtained. The statute book contains analogous powers to this above suggested. (See particularly the eleventh section of the act of Congress of April 25, 1808.)

The existing laws do not go to this extent. They do not authorize the demand of security in any shape, or any interposition on the part of the magistracy as a preventive, where there is reason to suspect an intention to commit the offence. They rest upon the general footing of punishing the offence merely where, if there be full evidence of the actual perpetration of the crime, the party is handed over, after the trial, to the penalty denounced. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Hon JOHN FORSYTH,
Chairman Com. Foreign Relations.

Secretary of State to Mr. Forsyth.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 10, 1817.

SIR: In addition to the letter which I wrote to you on the 6th, in reply to the one which you wrote to me on the 1st instant, I have the honor to state, that information has been received at this Department, from various sources, that vessels have been armed and equipped in our ports for the purpose of cruising against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States, and no doubt is entertained that this information was in some instances correct. The owners of these vessels have, however, generally taken care so to conceal these armaments and equipments, and the objects of them, as to render it extremely difficult, under existing circumstances, to prevent or punish this infraction of the law. It has been represented—

1st. That vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, or foreigners, have been armed and equipped in our ports, and have cleared out from our custom-houses, as merchant vessels; and, after touching at other ports, have hoisted the flag of some of the belligerents, and cruised under it against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States.

2dly. That in other instances, other vessels, armed and equipped in our ports, have hoisted such flags after clearing out and getting to sea, and have, in like manner, cruised against the commerce of nations in amity with the United States, extending their depredations, in a few cases, to the property of citizens of the United States.

3dly. That in other instances, foreign vessels have entered the ports of the United States, and, availing themselves of the privileges allowed by our laws, have, in various modes, augmented their armaments, with pretended commercial views; have taken on board citizens of the United States, as passengers, who, on their arrival at neutral ports, have assumed the character of officers and soldiers in the service of some of the parties in the contest now prevailing in our southern hemisphere.

Information, founded upon these representations, has from time to time been given to the attorneys and collectors of the respective districts in which the armaments are stated to have been made; but, from the difficulty of obtaining the necessary evidence to establish facts on which the law would operate, few prosecutions have been instituted.

In reply to your second inquiry, I beg leave to refer to the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means, during the last session of Congress, in the case of the "American Eagle," and to the papers enclosed herewith. I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Chairman Com. Foreign Relations.

Extract of a letter from John Dick, Esq., Attorney of the United States for the district of Louisiana, to the Secretary of State, dated

MARCH 1, 1816.

Attempts to violate the laws, by fitting out and arming, and by augmenting the force of vessels, have no doubt been frequent; but certainly in no instance successful, except where conducted under circumstances of concealment that eluded discovery, and almost suspicion; or where carried on at some remote part of the coast, beyond the reach of detection or discovery. In every instance where it was known that these illegal acts were attempting, or where it was afterwards discovered that they had been committed, the persons engaged, as far as they were known, have been prosecuted, while the vessels fitted out, or attempted to be fitted out, have been seized and labelled under the act of the 5th of June, 1794; and when captures have been made by vessels thus fitted out and armed, or in which their force was augmented or increased within our waters, where the property taken was brought within our jurisdiction, or even found upon the high seas by our cruisers and brought in, it has been restored to the original Spanish owners, and, in some instances, damages awarded against the captors.

An enumeration of the cases in which individuals have been prosecuted for infringing, or attempting to infringe, our neutrality, in aid of the Governments of New Spain, and in which vessels have been seized and labelled, under the act of the 5th of June, 1794, together with a list of the vessels and property restored to the original Spanish owners, (confining the whole to the operations of the year commencing March, 1815, and ending February, 1816,) will show more conclusively, perhaps, than anything else can, how totally without foundation are the complaints, and how misplaced are the assertions of the Minister of Spain on this head.

The names of the individuals prosecuted in the district court of the United States for the Louisiana district, during the year 1815, for violating, or attempting to violate, the neutrality of the United States, in aid of the Governments of the United Provinces of New Grenada, and of the United Provinces of Mexico.

Schooner Two Brothers, restored.

Enumeration of vessels and property brought within the Louisiana district, captured under the flags and by authority of the Governments of New Grenada and of Mexico, libelled on the part of the original Spanish owners, and restored upon the ground that the capturing vessels had been fitted out and armed, or had their force augmented, within the waters of the United States.

1. Schooner Cometa, restored April, 1815.
2. Schooner Dorada, proceeds restored 16th May, 1815, $3,050.
3. Schooner Amiabe Maria, $3,850.
4. Schooner Experimento, restored 3d August.
5. The polacre brig De Regla and cargo, proceeds restored 18th December, 1815, $19,209 50.
6. Schooner Alerta and cargo, being the proceeds of the capture of about eighteen small vessels, restored 18th December, 1815, $62,150 05.

Damages awarded to the original owners against the captors in the two foregoing cases, $55,272 99.

7. Cargo of the schooner Petit Melan, restored 1st February, 1816, $2,444 31.

8. Cargo of the schooner Presidente, 1st February, 1816, $10,931 15.

9. Schooner Sante Ritor and cargo, restored 1st February, 1816, $37,962 94.

The preceding account of Spanish property restored to the original proprietors, after being in the possession of the enemies of Spain, is defective, inasmuch as it does not comprehend the whole of the cases of restoration that have taken place within the period to which the detail is confined. The very hasty manner in which I have made this communication did not admit of a more accurate statement. The principal cases, however, are included in it.

In several other cases, where the property was claimed for the original Spanish owners, the claims were dismissed, because it did not appear that any violation of our neutrality had taken place. The capturing vessels were not armed, nor was their force augmented within our jurisdiction, nor had the captures been made within a marine league of our shore. The principles that guided the decisions of the court, as well in restoring the property captured, where our neutral means had been used, as in declining all interference where that was not the case, manifest, I think, a disposition to, and an exercise of, the most rigid neutrality between the parties.

If the whole of this letter is not an act of supererogation, to dwell longer upon those parts of the correspondence of the Chevalier De Onis which relate to Louisiana would at least be so considered.

Mr. Glenn to the Secretary of State.

BALTIMORE, Sept. 7, 1816.

SIR: Immediately upon the receipt of your letters of the 16th of August, I obtained from the collector of this port an affidavit, stating that Thomas Taylor had, in April last, sworn that he was a citizen of the United States, and, as such, had cleared out the schooner Romp, which vessel the collector also declared, on oath, he believed to have cruised against the vessels of the King of Spain since that time. Upon which affidavit, an intelligent justice of the peace of this city, well disposed, upon the score of political feeling, to do as much as justice required towards the punishment of Taylor for his conduct, issued a warrant, by virtue of which Taylor was arrested. Upon its return, I appeared before the justice, (whose name is John Dougherty,) and presented all the documents which were sent to me in company with your letter, which were read and received as evidence by him. I also caused a sailor, who had served on board the Romp, and who was at that time in hospital at this place, to be summoned, as also the editor of the "American" newspaper, in which Taylor's letter had appeared, bearing date at "Baltimore, the 10th of July, 1816;" all of whom were examined, on oath, before the justice. The sailor was cautioned not to criminate himself, upon which he refused to answer any question. Mr. Murphy, one of the editors of the American, declared, on oath, that he had no authority whatever from Taylor to publish the letter which bore his signature, but that he had taken the same, of his own accord, as an article of intelligence, from a newspaper printed in Charleston. I was not, you will perceive, in the slightest degree assisted in my case by the examination of these witnesses. I, however, urged before the justice that the depositions laid a sufficient ground of probable cause of suspicion against Taylor, when connected with the affidavit of the collector. I also produced some authority to show that Taylor ought to be committed. Whereupon the justice desired until yesterday morning to consider upon the case, and requested that the marshal might be present at the time of his decision, which accordingly took place. The justice has, notwithstanding all these circumstances, actually discharged Taylor, upon the ground, as he states, that he could not find there was any probable cause to believe he was concerned with, or advised Squire Fisk, to commit the acts of piracy which were committed by him on his late cruise, and as Taylor never was on board the Romp from the time she left Baltimore. Thus ended this case, as far as I have gone.

Judge Houston will be here in one or two days to hold a district court. Upon his arrival, I shall lay all the proofs before him, and claim from him a warrant, which I presume he will grant without hesitation, the issue of which shall be communicated to you without delay.

As the editors of the American and Patriot tell me they copied the letter written by Taylor, bearing date the 10th of July, 1816, from the Savannah Republican or the Charleston Patriot, unless I can procure the testimony of one of these editors to prove that Taylor actually gave them that letter for publication, I do not see how he is to be implicated criminally with Fisk. If Judge Houston should take cognizance of the case, I will, at all events, be glad to have the witnesses who were examined in Virginia here on the 7th of November next, to give evidence before the grand jury which will be summoned to attend the circuit court.

In this case, there are a variety of circumstances tending to show Taylor's co-operation with, and assistance to, Fisk; but none, I fear, sufficiently conclusive to convict him, unless we can prove the authenticity of his letter of instructions, which can only be done by procuring his orders to publish his last letter, which admits the authenticity of the first.

I enclose to you four letters which have been lately received by me from the Spanish Consul here, as also my answer to them. I shall be happy to hear that I have, in all these affairs, acted in such a manner as to meet your approbation.

I have the honor, &c.,

ELIAS GLENN.

GREAT BRITAIN—DEPORTATION OF SLAVES.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 7, 1817.]
To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the 28th of last month.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 7, 1817.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 5, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom has referred the resolution of the Senate of the 28th of last month, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess touching the execution of so much of the first article of the late Treaty of Peace and Amity between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America as relates to the restitution of slaves, has the honor to submit to the President the accompanying papers, marked A, B, C, D, and E, as containing all the information in this department supposed to be called for by the said resolution.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

MAY 11, 1815.

I am sorry to have to state that the British naval commanders have construed the stipulation in the treaty not to carry off with their forces the slaves whom they had taken from our citizens differently from this Government. My correspondence with Mr. Baker, of which a copy is enclosed, will show the ground of this difference, which appears to be so decidedly in favor of the United States, that it has excited surprise that it should have existed; and still greater that the British officers should have acted on their construction, by removing the slaves in question. Mr. Baker makes a distinction between the slaves who were in British ships-of-war in our waters, and those who were in the posts held by their forces at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, but I think without reason. It seems to have been the intention of the parties, and to be the clear import of the article, that they should carry off no slaves that were then within our limits. They were as much in the possession and under the authority of the British commanders in the forts, or other places held by their troops on the land, as in their vessels. It was as much a carrying away in the one instance as in the other; and the injury to the proprietors of the slaves was the same. In short, I see no ground for such a distinction. The United States have a right either to the restitution of all these slaves, or to compensation for their loss. I shall forward to you, without delay, a list of those thus removed, with an estimate of their value; the payment of which, if the slaves themselves are not restored, you will claim of the British Government.

[Enclosed in the preceding.]

APRIL 1, 1815.

SIR: I regret to have to state that the commanders of His Britannic Majesty's naval forces in the Chesapeake, and on Cumberland island, and other islands off the southern coast, have construed the stipulation in the first article of the Treaty of Peace, lately concluded between the United States and Great Britain, very differently from what is thought to be a just construction of it by this Government. They comprise slaves, and other private property, under the same regulation with artillery, and other public property, and contend that none ought to be restored except such as were, at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, in the forts and places where they were originally taken.

By the first article of the treaty it is stipulated "that all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken from either party by the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property."

A very obvious distinction exists between private and public property; and there may be a strong and obvious motive for destroying the one, when there can be none for destroying the other. It frequently happens, in surrendering territory by a treaty of peace, that the party withdrawing stipulates a right to destroy the fortifications in its possession, and to carry away or destroy the artillery and munitions of war in them; but it is believed that no example can be found of a stipulation to authorize the destruction of private property of any kind, especially slaves. Equally strange would a stipulation be not to destroy them.

The terms of the article preserve this distinction between public and private property in a guarded manner. All territory, places, and possessions, with a particular exception, shall be restored, without destroying or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which remain there upon the exchange of ratifications. So far the stipulation acts upon proper subjects, and conforms to usage. Extend it to slaves and other private property, and how inconsistent and unnatural the application! Had it been intended to put slaves and other private property on the same ground with artillery and other public property, the terms "originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein on the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," would have followed at the end of the sentence, after "slaves and other private property." In that case, both interests, the public and the private, would have been subject to the same restraint. But, by separating them from each other, and putting the restrictive words immediately after "artillery and other public property," it shows that it was intended to confine their operation to those objects only, excluding from it "slaves and other private property."

Other consequences, equally inconsistent with the spirit and equity of the article, would follow from the construction given of it by the British naval commanders. If the slaves and other private property are placed on the same footing with artillery and other public property, the consequence must be that all will be carried away. It is believed that none of the slaves were taken in forts or other places where the British troops happened to be at the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty. By far the greater number, if not the whole, were taken from proprietors inhabiting the country bordering on the bays and rivers which empty into the Atlantic. As this fact was well known to the Commissioners of both nations, it furnishes a conclusive argument against the construction contended for by the British naval commanders. It cannot be believed that the Commissioners would have agreed to a stipulation which they respectively knew would produce no effect.

In supposing that all the slaves would be carried away under the construction given to this article by the British and naval commanders, I have considered the term "place," in a qualified sense, synonymous with "fort," as a military station, taken by the British forces and held by them at the peace. But if it is construed in a more enlarged sense, such as the country from which the slaves were taken, none could be carried away even under that construction. That it must be construed in this enlarged sense, if applicable to slaves and other private property, is obvious from the consideration that the act of taking them removed them from the places where they were taken.

The stipulation in this article, in relation to the point in question, by a fair and just construction, appears to me to amount to this: that each party shall restore, without delay, all the territory, places, and possessions, which had been taken by it, with the exception of certain islands; that neither shall destroy or carry away artillery or public property, provided they be, at the time of the exchange of ratifications, in the forts or places in which they were originally captured; that neither shall carry away slaves or private property. The restraint provided against the carrying away of the latter is evidently connected with the great object of the article, the restoration of territory, places, and possessions, and not with forts and places, in the qualified sense suggested: in which sense it applies to artillery and other public property only, the ordinary and proper appurtenances of forts and other military posts.

From every view which I have been able to take of this subject, I am of opinion that the United States are entitled to all the slaves and other private property which were in the possession of the British forces, within the limits of the United States, on the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, whether they were in forts or British ships of war.

Presuming that your Government has instructed you upon this subject, and that it concurs in this construction of the article, I flatter myself that you will give directions to the British naval commanders not to carry away any of the slaves and other private property which may thus be fairly claimed by the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER, Esq., &c.

Great Britain—Deportation of Slaves.Mr. Baker to Mr. Monroe.

WASHINGTON, April 3, 1815.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 1st instant, stating that the commanders of His Majesty's naval forces have given a different construction to that part of the first article of the Treaty of Peace lately concluded between the two countries which relates to the restoration of slaves and private property from what is thought by the American Government to be its just construction, by making the restriction annexed to the restoration of artillery and public property likewise apply to slaves and private property; at the same time expressing your opinion that the United States are entitled to all the slaves and other private property in possession of the British forces within the limits of the United States on the exchange of the ratifications, whether they were in forts or British ships of war, and requesting, under the supposition that His Majesty's Government concurred in this construction of the article, and had furnished me with instructions accordingly, that I would give directions to the naval commanders not to carry away any of the slaves so claimed by the United States.

As I have not received any communication on the subject from the commander-in-chief on the American station, by whose orders the several naval commanders have, no doubt, been guided, I am unacquainted with the grounds on which he rests his interpretation of the words of the first article of the treaty. It is, however, not improbable that he may have imagined that it could not have been intended by the Plenipotentiaries of the two countries that there should be a general prohibition against carrying away from the places restored all private property of every description, and to whomsoever belonging, found therein on the exchange of the ratifications; and that, therefore, as some limitation must have been contemplated in the case of private as well as public property, the restriction attached by the words immediately preceding to the latter, was likewise applicable to the former.

I regret to find that, by the view taken of this part of the first article, the Government of the United States claims the negroes, originally American, on board the British ships of war which happened to be within the limits of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications, as I do not conceive that it can be satisfactorily shown that this construction is sanctioned by the words of the article; and I have no hesitation in stating my belief, founded on the best means of information, that, at the time the article was framed, it was meant that the prohibition against carrying away slaves and private property should be taken in connexion with the restoration of territory, places, and possessions; and that if it had been supposed by His Majesty's Plenipotentiaries at Ghent that the words were susceptible of the construction now given to them, and that a claim would be founded upon them for the delivering up of persons who had sought refuge during the war on board of British ships, their insertion would have been decidedly objected to, and others proposed.

Not being, however, in possession of any instructions from my Government upon this subject, the only step which it is in my power to take in relation to it is to transmit to England, and to the naval commander-in-chief on this station, copies of your letter; and I have no doubt that the reasoning contained in it will, in the most perfect spirit of amity, be duly and considerately examined, with the sincere desire to give that interpretation to the article in question which may be most consonant to justice and to its true and fair meaning.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ANTHONY ST. JOHN BAKER.

Mr. Graham to the Secretary of State.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Feb. 28, 1815.

SIR: I now enclose a copy of the correspondence between the Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to receive and make the necessary arrangements respecting the public and private property in possession of the British forces within the Chesapeake bay, to be given up under the first article of the Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain, and Captain John Clavelle, commanding the British forces in the Chesapeake bay.

In pursuance of the arrangements therein made, Colonel Bayly has remained to take an inventory of the property and slaves, and to endeavor to ascertain, as far as practicable, to whom they belong.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

GEORGE GRAHAM.

HON. JAMES MONROE.

Messrs. Bayly, Graham, and Skinner, to Mr. Clavelle.

SCHOONER ADELINÉ,

Chesapeake Bay, Feb. 23, 1815.

SIR: The undersigned Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to receive and make all necessary arrangements concerning the property which may be in the possession of the forces of His Britannic Majesty in the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, and which is to be delivered up and restored, agreeably to the first article of the Treaty of Peace and Amity between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, concluded and signed at Ghent, on the 24th day of December, 1814, have the honor to inform you, that, having exhibited to you their powers, they are now ready to proceed to execute the trust reposed in them; and they take this occasion to observe, that, under the stipulations of the first article of the said treaty, all slaves, and other private property, which may now be in possession of the forces of His Britannic Majesty within the Chesapeake, are claimed to be delivered up forthwith, and that all such as may have been removed since the 17th instant, (the day on which the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty took place,) are claimed to be restored with all convenient despatch.

We have the honor to be, &c.,

THO. M. BAYLY,
GEORGE GRAHAM,
JOHN S. SKINNER.

Captain JOHN CLAVELLE,
Com'r of H. B. Majesty's forces.

Mr. Clavelle to Messrs. Bayly, Graham, and Skinner.

H. M. SHIP ORLANDO,
In the Patuxent, Feb. 23, 1815.

GENTLEMEN: I have just had the honor of receiving your communication of this day's date, stating that you are appointed, on the part of the United States, to receive and make all necessary arrangements concerning the property which may be in possession of the forces of His Britannic Majesty in the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, agreeably to the first article of the Treaty of Peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States; and in reply I beg to state, that I understand the first article of the treaty, relative to private and public property, thus, viz: all territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken from either party by the other during the war, or which may have been taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public stores, or any slaves, or other private property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratification of this treaty.

As none of the slaves now in Tangier were captured there, I cannot feel myself at liberty to deliver them up; far less can I give up those now serving on board His Britannic Majesty's ships, as by entering into the service they made themselves free men. I shall, however, give directions that the whole of those on board the different ships, of every description, shall be discharged into this ship until I receive instructions from Rear Admiral Cockburn, to whom I shall immediately despatch a vessel.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOHN CLAVELLE.

To. Messrs. BAYLY, GRAHAM, and SKINNER.

Messrs. Bayly, Graham, and Skinner to Mr. Clavelle.

SCHOONER ADELINÉ,
Chesapeake Bay, Feb. 23, 1815.

SIR: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reply to our communication of this date, and regret to find that you do not feel yourself at liberty to deliver up all slaves and other private property of the citizens of the United States, which came under your control previously or subsequently to the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty concluded by the Commissioners on the part of the United States and Great Britain, and still remaining within the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof.

As, however, you have put a construction upon the first article of the treaty, which, in our estimation, the terms do not warrant, and difficulties have arisen in the execution of our trust which were not anticipated, it becomes our duty to ask your co-operation in taking, for the mutual satisfaction of our respective Governments, an inventory of all slaves and other private property within the waters of the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, and now in the possession of His Britannic Majesty's forces; that the difference of construction placed upon the first article of said treaty may be satisfactorily adjusted, and its stipulations executed in good faith. We are further satisfied you will perceive the propriety of furnishing us, for the information of the proper authorities, as far as the means in your power may render it practicable, with an account of all slaves and other private property of citizens of the United States, which may have been removed from the Chesapeake, or any of the shores or islands thereof, since the date of the ratification of the treaty; and, in like manner, with an account of all artillery or other public property, if any, which was, on the date of the ratification of the said treaty, or which may still remain within the forts or places where the same was originally captured.

We have the honor to be, &c.

Mr. Clavelle to the American Commissioners.

H. B. M. SHIP ORLANDO,
In the Patuxent, Feb. 24, 1815.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your communication of yesterday's date, which I had the honor of receiving last evening, I beg to state, that I do conceive the terms of the first article of the Treaty of Peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, do admit of the construction I put on it yesterday in my note to you, and not at all applicable to the slaves now on Tangier island, or those on board His Britannic Majesty's ships under my command, now in the Chesapeake, they not having been captured "there." But, in order that every thing may be perfectly understood, and properly arranged hereafter, I shall be most happy to meet your wishes for the mutual satisfaction of our respective Governments, by ascertaining and taking an inventory of all slaves, and other private property of the citizens of the United States, within the waters of the Chesapeake, or on the shores or islands thereof, and now in the possession of His Britannic Majesty's forces.

I further state, for your information, that no slaves, or other private property, have been removed from the Chesapeake, or any of the shores or islands thereof, since the exchange of the ratification of the treaty; nor has any artillery or other public property.

As soon as the weather is fine I shall proceed to Tangier, for the purpose of assisting you in taking an inventory of the slaves, which I certainly cannot think of giving up until I receive instructions on that head, conceiving they do not come within the limits of the first article of the treaty.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN CLAVELLE.

To the AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. Bayly to the Secretary of State.

ACCOMAC, April 18, 1815.

SIR: Yesterday Captain Clavelle, with the Orlando and Madagascar frigates, and schr. Bream, sailed from near Tangier harbor for Bermuda. I enclose to you copies of my last letter to him, and his reply, upon the subject of the slaves and other property, public and private, which ought not to have been carried away.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS M. BAYLY.

ACCOMAC, April 13, 1815.

SIR: I am informed that you intend to-morrow to leave the Chesapeake bay, with the ships under your command; and I wish to know your determination respecting the restoration of the slaves and other property, public and private, which were captured from the United States, and citizens thereof, during the late war, and which were in the waters of the Chesapeake, and islands thereof, on the day the ratification of the Treaty of Peace and Amity between the United States and Great Britain was exchanged.

You have informed me of your visit to Mr. Baker, Chargé d'Affaires of His Britannic Majesty at Washington, and that you have received from Rear Admiral Cockburn his instructions; I may, therefore, expect your final determination, and I hope that your construction upon the first article of this Treaty of Amity is such, that the slaves and other property contemplated by it will not be carried away.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS M. BAYLY.

H. B. M. SHIP ORLANDO,

In the Chesapeake, April 15, 1815.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 13th instant I beg leave to state, that my determination is not to restore any slaves, private or public property, captured before the exchange of the ratifications of the Treaty of Peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, agreeably to my instructions from Rear Admiral Cockburn on that head.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Copy of a letter from Thomas M. Newell, Captain of Sea Fencibles, and Thomas Spalding, to Brigadier General Floyd, dated at SAFEL0 ISLAND, March 16, 1815.

SIR: We left Darien on Sunday, the 5th inst., and arrived at Dungeness at 4 o'clock on Monday. As we observed British troops embarking, and as we believed many slaves and much private property would be sent off with them, we determined to call upon Admiral Cockburn immediately, and to present the letters from General Pinckney and yourself, with our letter of authority. On reading General Pinckney's letter, and discovering that, instead of a copy of the Treaty of Peace from the Secretary of State's office, the National Intelligencer was enclosed, Admiral Cockburn expressed much surprise; and it appeared, from his manner, that his temper was not a little ruffled by the incident. He totally denied the authority of a treaty so communicated to him. After reminding him that the Intelligencer was the State paper of the United States for such purposes, that in England the publication of a treaty in the Gazette would be a proper promulgation of it, and the impossibility that there would be of furnishing to every detached squadron that floated upon the sea any more authenticated copy of a Treaty of Peace than the public papers afforded; these were the ideas brought forward, and this the language, with the exception of its being abridged. Admiral Cockburn still denied our positions, but then proposed to us that we should make a transcript of the treaty; that we should certify it to be a true copy, and should present it to him as such on the part of General Pinckney and yourself. As forms were no object, we assented to this at once. The difficulty having been got over, we thought it proper to enter immediately on the subject-matter of our mission, and requested to know of Admiral Cockburn what public property taken at Point Petre, or at St. Mary's, remained upon Cumberland island, in the ships near Dungeness, or in the ships then lying in the sound, of which there were many; some of these ships taken at St. Mary's, and there loaded with property taken at the same place.

As we had no instructions as to the extent of the restitution we should demand, and were left to our own judgment on the occasion, we determined to adopt the same rule in regard to private property and to slaves that we had adopted in regard to public property. We, therefore, demanded all the slaves and private property, of every description, taken or received at Cumberland island, at St. Mary's, or St. Simon's, and which were then on Cumberland island, or lying in the waters contiguous to the same, on board his ships, or which had been there at the ratification of the Treaty of Peace by the President of the United States; and, in making this demand, we were happy to find that a great portion of the public and private property, and almost all the slaves taken or received since the British forces had been operating in Georgia, came within the limits we had prescribed to our demand. To our inquiry as to public property, and our demand as to private Admiral Cockburn at once replied, "he had no public property; that the guns he had removed; the munitions of war he had destroyed;" but if they were there, not having been taken at Cumberland island, which place alone remained in his possession at the ratification of the treaty, they did not come within the operation of the first article of it; that, with regard to slaves and other property, he meant to adopt the same rule; "that the property and slaves taken at Cumberland, and remaining there at the ratification, would be restored; but what were taken or received from other places, although on Cumberland, or in the ships in the river or sound, would not."

It will be understood that we do not here repeat the words, but the substance, of what Admiral Cockburn said, who appeared, during the whole of this conversation, a little warm. Having discovered the construction which Admiral Cockburn was pleased to put upon the treaty, and his manner forbidding a hope of a change of opinion, Mr. Spalding thought it proper to draw his attention to the ships then lying within a hundred yards of the wharf of Dungeness, on board of which it was known some slaves were, by observing to him that the river was taken possession of at the same time that Cumberland was occupied by the British forces; that it was equally in his possession with the soil adjacent on the ratification of the treaty, and would only be restored to the United States the moment he withdrew his forces from Dungeness; that, consequently, under his own rule, the property and slaves on board those ships, originally taken at Cumberland, it was expected would partake of the quality of the property and slaves originally found on Cumberland, and remaining there. To this Admiral Cockburn replied, that wherever the British flag was, there was British territory; and, by way of elucidating his position, demanded of Mr. Spalding whether, if he (Admiral Cockburn) committed a murder on board one of those ships in time of peace, he believed him amenable to the laws of the United States? "No, sir," said he, "I am amenable to my own Government, and to my own sovereign." To this it was replied, he was amenable to his own Government and to his own sovereign as an officer, but he was amenable to the laws of the United States as a man. And it was in turn asked whether he believed, if a murder was committed on board an American ship in the river Thames, the laws of England would not operate upon the murderer? "No, sir." "I, too, sir, have studied the laws of England in my youth, and I think they would." "Then, sir, we are at issue, and it is unnecessary to say more." "If we are at issue, Admiral Cockburn, upon an abstract principle, it is of little importance. Will you please to turn over to the first article of the treaty, and we will see if we can agree upon a practical result?" This conversation is reported in its very words, that you may be possessed of the Admiral's manner of reasoning and mode of thinking at our arrival; and it was closed by observing that we should address a note to him, which we hoped he would answer as soon as possible; then took our leave. The next day, the 7th instant, we called upon him, and presented a transcript of the treaty, certified by us to be a true copy, which he accepted. We then handed him the following note, (No. 1,) which, after having read, he promised to answer the following morning. And here it is proper to observe, that, at the meeting, and at the many that followed it, Admiral Cockburn was calm, and his manner courteous in a high degree. During the evening of this day we understood that Admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane had arrived, and, consequently, we should not receive any answer to our note until there had been a conference between Admiral Cochrane and himself. At this delay we felt no regret, as we hoped from him, from many causes not necessary to state, a more liberal construction of the treaty. The weather was so bad that it was the 10th before this communication took place, immediately after which Admiral Cockburn transmitted to us the following note, in answer to the one we had addressed him. (No. 2.)

Finding this note was approved of in the margin by Sir Alexander Cochrane, and understanding, and even knowing from our own sight, that he had taken his departure from the coast by the time we had received this note, all attempts at demonstrating the incorrectness of the conclusion drawn by Admiral Cockburn from the first article of the treaty seemed useless; for Admiral Cockburn no longer had the power, if he had the inclination, to correct his first opinion; and we presently understood that even the small return of slaves and property embraced by his construction of the treaty was yielded with some reluctance by Sir Alexander Cochrane. We, therefore, the same evening, addressed to Admiral Cockburn the note that follows. (No. 3.) And, in the conversation which took place after the delivery of this note, it was agreed that orders would be given to restore to the owners any slaves that were received in the British camp or ships after the ratification of the treaty; and, in consequence of this understanding, orders were given to restore some slaves so situated by Admiral Cockburn; but every means were used by the inferior officers to prevent the due execution of these orders, particularly on board the Regulus, Captain Robert Ramsay, as we are informed, and as Captain Newell himself was witness to. It was at the same time indicated to us the course which would be pursued with the slaves that had repaired to the British camp or British ships, from Florida, namely: that they should be sent to Bermuda, and there confined in a ship until the decision of the British Administration was taken on their case. We have deemed it proper to communicate this as not unimportant to our own Government and our own citizens.

On the morning of the 11th an answer to our note was received, covering a list of seventy-seven negroes, a few bales of cotton, and a few horses and cattle, which were to be restored, as having been originally taken at Cumberland island, and having remained there at the ratification of the treaty. (No. 4.)

In order to place the matter in a proper light, we the same day transmitted the following answer, which closed our joint correspondence with the Admiral. (No. 5.)

And here it is necessary, for understanding the last clause of our letter, to state what led to it. Mr. Spalding had suggested to Admiral Cockburn, after every other means had failed, his giving permission to claimants to go on board his ships in the offing, to obtain the voluntary return of their slaves; this he assented to with great willingness. He sent an officer with them, and, in the presence of ourselves, gave the most positive instruction to the officer to have every facility afforded them. This produced a return of thirteen slaves; six of Captain Wyll's, five of Mr. Couper's, one of Major Butler's, and one of Major Johnston's; and would have produced the return of hundreds, if it had not been for the means employed by the inferior officers to prevent their return. On the morning of the 13th instant, the British flag was struck at Dungeness, and, having consulted with the many respectable gentlemen with us as to the necessity of the occasion, we called upon Captain Massias for an officer and twenty-five men to be sent to Dungeness, to prevent, as far as possible, fugitive slaves still joining the British ships that were yet in the offing, and were to remain so for two or three days.

Mr. Spalding then addressed the following letter to Admiral Cockburn, and followed Captain Newell, who had already taken his departure. (No. 6.)

Having thus, sir, closed the mission with which we were charged by General Pinckney and yourself, it is important, in our opinion, that we should observe to you that, on our arrival at Dungeness, on the 6th instant, the United States' barge taken at St. Mary's was at the wharf, but was removed that evening; and we also understood that most of the cannon taken at Point Petre were removed, subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, from Cumberland. Five or six hundred negroes, brought from St. Simon's as late as the 15th February, were at Cumberland long after the ratification, and many of them sent off in the night of the day after our arrival.

In conversation with Mr. Spalding, it was admitted by Admiral Cockburn that Major Kinsman, of the marines, had continued to enter fugitive slaves into the colonial and West India regiments, after notice of the ratification of the treaty, and until he (Admiral Cockburn) had given written orders to the contrary.

Accompanying this letter, you will receive a list of such slaves as their masters have returned to us. From Mr. Hamilton, who lost two hundred and twenty odd, and from Major Butler, who lost one hundred and thirty, and from many others, whom the terror of the times had driven away, we have no returns. Nor is it to be wondered at that a thin population fled before a war which has been conducted in the spirit which this has been since January last; for it carried insurrection as its means, and, like the awful visitations of Providence, ruin has marked its course. But we state, sir, with pleasure, that the unhappy sufferers look with manly firmness to their own Government for a reparation of their injuries; and to that Government we beg leave to consign them, with a firm persuasion that they will not be disappointed in their expectations.

And we remain, sir, &c.

CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 6, 1815.

SIR: We are instructed by General Floyd to call upon you, and are by him authorized to receive from you any public or private property, or any slaves, that are or were in your possession at the time of the ratification of the Treaty of Peace by the President of the United States. The construction put upon this article by us is, that all private property and all slaves in your possession, whether on land or water, at the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, are to be restored. We place this construction upon the first article of the treaty, because it appears to have originated in the most amicable dispositions of both the American and British Commissioners—amicable on the part of the American Commissioners, in only demanding what might be restored without inconvenience; amicable on the part of the British Commissioners, in promising to restore all that could be restored without great inconvenience;—for we cannot persuade ourselves that the restoration of private property or slaves is to be limited to the slaves or property taken in the forts you occupied; for it must be obvious to you, sir, and it must be obvious to all, that there are no slaves, and that there is but little private property, ever taken in forts. The limitation that appears to exist in the first part of the first article of the treaty, as to such property as may remain in the forts and places in your possession, is obviously confined to artillery and other public property taken in such forts or places, and which, if once removed, would have required much trouble and much expense to restore. And this conclusion is the more obvious, from noticing that in the following part of the same article, archives, records, deeds, and papers, which are objects of easy transport, are promised to be restored, into whosoever hands they may have fallen, or whosoever they may have been transferred.

Begging that we may have an answer upon this subject, so deeply interesting to the inhabitants of Georgia, as soon as possible, we remain, sir, &c.

Admiral COCKBURN.

HEADQUARTERS, CUMBERLAND ISLAND,
March 7, 1815.

GENTLEMEN: I have had the honor to receive the document which you state yourselves authorized to assure me is a true copy of the Treaty of Peace which has been concluded between our respective Governments, and which you have been instructed to lay before me by Generals Pinckney and Floyd.

Accompanying this document, I am likewise honored with your note of this day, informing me of your being authorized to receive from me any public or private property, or slaves, to be restored by me under the first article of the aforesaid treaty, and explaining to me the construction you are pleased to put upon that article. But I only find in the certified copy you have laid before me, that "all territory, places, or possessions, taken during the war, or after signing the treaty, (excepting only as therein excepted,) shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction or carrying away of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property." It becomes, therefore, alone necessary for me to state to you, that Cumberland island being the only place or possession taken from America in this neighborhood, which was retained by me at the date of the ratification alluded to, I shall as quickly as possible evacuate it, without causing any destruction; and I shall leave on it, or deliver to you, whatever public or private property or slaves (originally captured here) remained upon the island at the date of the ratification.

I have not the slightest reason or inclination to doubt the amicable disposition you state to have actuated the British and American Commissioners in forming this treaty. It appears, however, clear to me, by the expressions they have thought proper to adopt in it, that I am only required or authorized to make the restitution I have above stated; and I must beg to decline venturing an opinion as to whether the treaty is properly worded, according to the intentions of the Commissioners; but I apprehend, had they wished to imply (as you conceive) "that all private property and slaves in my possession, whether on land or water, were to be restored," it might have been so specified without difficulty; and although you observe there are no slaves, and but little private property ever taken in "forts," yet a continuation of the words "or places" may, perhaps, do away the difficulty which presented itself to you on that point. Therefore, gentlemen, in giving up this place, in conformity with the treaty you have done me the honor to lay before me, I must beg to be excused from entering into discussion relative to captures made elsewhere, on land or water, and which have been removed from the places where captured prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SIR: Your letter of the 7th is before us; and after the desire you have been pleased to express of declining all discussion of your construction of the first article of the Treaty of Peace between the United States and Great Britain, it only remains for us to call upon you for a list of the property, public or private, and the slaves "originally captured on Cumberland island," which you have declared your readiness to deliver. It is our duty to add this further and final remark, that this list will, we presume, include all slaves originally captured on the island of Cumberland, or, having come from other sections of the country, have there first fallen under the dominion of the British arms; and, particularly, that it will include all slaves and other property taken or received since the ratification of the Treaty of Peace between our respective Governments.

HEADQUARTERS, CUMBERLAND ISLAND,
March 11, 1815.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 10th current, the first part of which obliges me to beg your reconsideration of my letter of the 7th, as, I believe, so far from declining therein "all discussion of my construction of the first article of the Treaty of Peace lately concluded between our Governments," I have quoted, verbatim, the major part of it, and have explicitly stated to you the line of conduct which my construction of the said article called upon me to adopt, in giving up the territory possessed by the forces under my orders.

I declined only entering into discussion respecting "captures made elsewhere, and which had been removed from the places where captured prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty," such not appearing to me to come within the specified intention of the aforesaid first article of the treaty; and you will perceive by his signature added to my letter, the Commander-in-Chief of His Britannic Majesty's forces on the North American station concurs with me in this opinion.

I have herewith the honor to transmit, in compliance with your request, a list of property and slaves originally captured on Cumberland island, and which appear to have remained on it at 11 P. M. of the 17th ultimo, the period at which the ratifications were exchanged. I have the honor to be, &c.

CUMBERLAND ISLAND, Mar. 11, 1815.

SIR: We have to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 11th instant, containing a list of slaves and other property which had been originally found on Cumberland island, and which were remaining on the island at the ratification of the Treaty of Peace by the President. Against this construction of the first article of the Treaty of Peace we must still protest; and we must still contend, sir, that all the property and all the slaves that were on Cumberland island, or in the rivers and waters adjacent to the same, at the ratification of the treaty, in the spirit of amity in which that article was concluded, should have been restored; and this construction of the first article of the treaty was the more important to the people of the United States, as a great proportion of the property taken, and a great proportion of the slaves received, were sent from the waters of the United States, or from the island of Cumberland, as late as between the period of the 2d and the 5th of March, and no inconsiderable number of slaves have been sent on board your shipping in the offing, even since we have had the honor of addressing to you our first note, of the 7th instant. But, sir, to have pressed our construction of the treaty after your letter had been approved of by the Commander-in-Chief, (Sir Alexander Cochrane,) and he had retired from the station, would have been something more than useless. We have then, sir, no alternative but to prefer this affair to our Government. We cannot, however, conclude this correspondence without acknowledging the pleasure we feel at the facilities which you have offered to all claimants of slaves to obtain their voluntary return—facilities which, we are sensible, would have been productive of more effect had more time been allowed to operate.

And we are, sir, &c.

CUMBERLAND ISLAND, March 13, 1815.

SIR: It is with much regret I have to state that of the slaves which you have ordered to be restored, as having joined the British forces under your command, after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace by the President of the United States, several of them, now on board the Regulus, Captain Ramsey, have not been delivered. These slaves are two of Mr. Armstrong's, (January and Mary Stubs,) one of the slaves of Mr. Miller, and the four of Mr. Copp, which were yesterday directed to be given up. I have to add, that two of the three slaves delivered up to Mr. Armstrong, the very night they returned home made their escape, and will unquestionably attempt to reach your ships. I must therefore request that any of the above persons that can be found, or any other slaves that may join your fleet, from the United States, before they quit this station, may be delivered over to Captain Massias, at Point Petre, or to his officer at Dungeness. I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Spalding, Esq., to the Secretary of State.

ST. GEORGE'S, (BERMUDA,) May, 1815.

We sailed from Savannah on the 10th of May, and arrived on the 19th at Bermuda. While I was yet doubtful whether to apply to Governor Cockburn, of the Bermudas, (as I soon understood there were but few American slaves remaining in his Government, except what were in the naval arsenal at Ireland, and under the control of the naval commander,) I received from Admiral Griffith, through a lieutenant of the British navy, an intimation that he was desirous of seeing the agent who was understood to have arrived from the United States to make some demand of slaves and property. I waited, therefore, upon the Admiral on the 20th instant, and found him very sick. I presented to him General Pinckney's authority, purporting to be derived from the President of the United States. He received me politely, appeared to me to be a mild and gentlemanly man; expressed much regret at the circumstance that led to the necessity of making this demand, but declared his inability to afford any relief; confirmed to me what I had before learned, of most of the slaves having been sent to Halifax. He desired me, to-morrow, to address him in writing; that he would transmit my communication to his Government, which was all that was in his power; spoke something of giving me facilities on board of his ships to see and obtain the voluntary return of slaves. Finding that he was ill, and much exhausted, I took my leave, and promised to address him a letter as soon as I could prepare one.

Governor Sir James Cockburn arrived at St.

George's on Saturday evening, and on Monday, the 22d, at an early hour, I called upon him, still undetermined in my own mind whether to make my application to him on the subject of my mission or not, until I knew, at least, that there was something in his power to grant worth asking for. I, however, as I believed it to be my duty, in the event of having something to request, presented to him General Pinckney's letter of authority. He instantly lost his temper; denied my authority contained in that letter; declared he would receive nothing from any one but the Secretary of State. After giving such explanations as I believed to comport with my duty, I found his irritation increased rather than diminished. He would not permit me to proceed to detail any of the reasons for my mission, though very ready, as he said he was bound in candor to do, to declare against the American interpretation of the first article of the treaty; and vehemently added, that he would rather Bermuda, and every man, woman, and child in it, were sunk under the sea, than surrender one slave that had sought protection under the flag of England. I could add more in this spirit, but more is not necessary. I withdrew from the Governor, and transmitted my letter, which was then ready, to the Admiral, and which is enclosed, (No. 1.)

I noticed the Governor came down to the wharf within a few moments after my leaving him, and embarked in a boat. I was then apprehensive the Admiral's communications would change their complexion; and this I found to be too true, as the enclosed letter, (No. 2,) which I received late on Tuesday, the 23d, will show.

No. 1.

Mr. Spalding to Rear Admiral Griffith.

ST. GEORGE'S, BERMUDA, May 22, 1815.

SIR: I am appointed by the President of the United States the agent, and instructed by him to proceed in the first place to Bermuda, and from thence to any other of the colonies of His Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of demanding the restoration of all public or private property, and particularly of all slaves, which have been taken from the United States after the ratification of the treaty, in contravention (as my Government conceives) of the first article.

It is not my desire, nor is it the desire of my Government, to enter into any discussion on the justice or policy of taking private property, or of receiving slaves during the continuation of the war; but that war having terminated happily for both nations, in peace, the object of that peace unquestionably is to heal the wounds that the hand of war has inflicted. To do this effectually, there must certainly be on both sides a liberal and enlightened construction of every article of the treaty; but, above all, of that article in which individual as well as national right is concerned. I will now beg leave to invite your attention to the words of the first article of the treaty; which are—whatsoever, taken from either party during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

After a careful perusal of this article, it very naturally and forcibly occurs to the mind that this article contains two separate and distinct principles—a restoration of public property; a restitution of private property; that there is a manner of restitution liberal and enlightened; there is a manner of restitution illiberal and unfriendly, which the British Commissioners, in the spirit of amity which dictated this article, were determined to guard against, by saying, "that all territory, places, and possessions, taken during the war, should be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any artillery or other public property, which shall remain therein after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty." These conditions can, from their nature, have no relation to private property; they cannot be applied to it but by a strange perversion of language, and, by being so applied, the whole quality of the article becomes changed; and instead of being liberal and friendly, becomes limited, illiberal, and unfriendly.

The Government of the United States was, therefore, greatly surprised to find that on a demand, at the Chesapeake, at Cumberland island, and in Louisiana, of public or private property, or slaves that were remaining within the limits of the United States at the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, the commanding officers everywhere adopted the extraordinary principle, that if either public or private property, or slaves, were removed a single mile from the place of capture, they were not restorable, though still within the limits of the United States; though even under the eye of the Commissioners who were instructed at the several points to demand the restoration, and, in many instances, in the presence of the original proprietors, many days after the ratification of the treaty had been notified to the officers commanding. Public and private property and slaves were shipped in a period of restored peace, in many instances to the ruin of the beholders, from the limits of the United States, because, as the commanding officers said, "the property or slaves were not taken at the particular point which the British forces occupied at the moment of the ratification of the treaty." So that all that was necessary to make the first article of the treaty, as far as regarded private property or slaves, a complete nullity, as the British commanders were morally certain of receiving the earliest intimation of the contents of the treaty, they had only to draw in their outposts, and to contract their limits to points where no property and few slaves had been taken. This was conspicuously the case in Georgia. Much property was taken at St. Mary's, and some negroes; at St. Simon's some cotton and other property, and many hundred slaves; from St. Simon's the British forces were withdrawn but four days before the ratification of the treaty, and two hundred British troops occupied St. Mary's for a day and a night even after the ratification of the treaty. Yet, sir, because these two places had not remained in the uniform possession of the British forces to the very moment of the ratification, all the property and all the slaves taken at either, and placed in deposit at Cumberland, were considered without the pale of its operation. Here I flatter myself I might rest, with assurance of your according in the justice of the construction which the Government of the United States has given to the first article of the treaty, in expecting that all public or private property, or slaves, which had been taken or received by the British forces during the war, and which remained within the limits of the United States at the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, whether on the land or within the acknowledged waters, would be restored.

But, not to be wanting to myself, and not to be wanting to my Government, I must reluctantly trespass upon your time while I enforce the distinction I drew in the first part of my letter, between public property, to which the limitation in the first article of the treaty relates, and which enlarges and liberalizes its operation, and its application to slaves and private property, which would limit and make null its operations.

There may be, and often is, a strong motive for destroying public, when there can be none for destroying private property. It frequently happens, in surrendering territory by a treaty of peace, that the party withdrawing stipulates a right to destroy the fortifications in its possession, and to carry away or destroy the artillery and munitions of war in them; but it is believed that no example can be found of a stipulation to authorize the destruction of private property of any kind, especially slaves. Equally strange would a stipulation be not to destroy them.

The terms of the article preserve this distinction between public and private property in a guarded manner.

All territory, places, and possessions, (with a particular exception,) shall be restored, without destroying or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which remain there upon the exchange of ratifications. So far, the stipulation acts upon proper subjects, and conforms to usage. Extend it to slaves and other private property, and how inconsistent and unnatural the application! Had it been intended to put slaves and other private property on the same ground with artillery and other public property, the terms "originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein on the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," would have followed at the end of the sentence after "slaves and other private property." In that case, both interests, the public and the private, would have been subject to the same restraint. But, by separating them from each other, and putting the restrictive words immediately after "artillery and other public property," it shows that it was intended to confine their operation to those objects only, excluding from it "slaves and other private property."

I will now close my letter to you by stating, that at the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, on the 17th of February, forty thousand dollars worth of cotton, tobacco, rice, other produce, and other goods, were on Cumberland island, or in the ship Countess Harcourt and others, taken at St. Mary's and in its vicinity; and that those ships lay at that time in the Cumberland river, within a short distance of the shore; that the Countess Harcourt and the ship Maria Theresa had taken refuge in His Catholic Majesty's province of East Florida; they depended upon the neutrality of their situation for protection, and made no resistance; that about seven hundred out of seven hundred and thirty negroes that joined the British forces from Georgia were on Cumberland island, or in the ships so taken and then lying in Cumberland river. The first of these negroes, excepting a few that had departed in ships of war, left the United States in the Countess Harcourt on the 19th of February; that many hundreds of them left Cumberland island on the night of the 6th of March, and after I had had myself the honor of demanding them, on the part of the United States, from Admiral Cockburn. I have not yet been furnished by my Government with a list of slaves or private property that were either at Tangier island or in Louisiana, liable to restitution under the first article; but from the public papers we are assured of the fact, and a few days will put me in possession of the necessary evidence of the property and slaves so situated. The documents in support of the facts in relation to the property and slaves from Georgia, I shall be ready at any time to present to you.

And I beg you, sir to believe that, if in any part of this letter I have used strong language, it is far from my intention to offend, for I feel fully assured my Government rejoices at the restoration of the relations of peace, and fondly hopes that neither time nor circumstance will again alienate two nations that manners, and customs, and language, and mutual interest should unite.

No. 2.

Admiral Griffith to Mr. Spalding.

HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP BULWARK,
Bermuda, May 23, 1815.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, informing me that you are appointed by the President of the United States the agent, and instructed by him to proceed, in the first place, to Bermuda, and from thence to any other of the colonies of His Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of demanding the restoration of all public or private property, and particularly of all slaves who have been taken from the United States after the ratification of the treaty, in contravention (as your Government conceives) of the first article.

Had I felt myself authorized or qualified to enter into a discussion of the several topics your letter embraces, it would, in the first place, have been my duty to call upon you to produce the authority under which you have come to these islands on a mission of this public nature; for I presume, as you state your appointment to be by the President of the United States, that the letter you put into my hand when I had the pleasure of seeing you the day before yesterday, (and which, if I recollect right, was signed "Pinckney," who you informed me was a Major General in the service of the United States,) is not the only authority you are in possession of. However, sir, it is quite unnecessary to take this preliminary step, for the subject of your letter appearing to me more properly to belong to our respective Governments to discuss, than to the officers, military or naval, of either, the regular channel through which to make any applications of the nature of those alluded to in it I should suppose would be the British Minister resident in the United States. Be this, however, as it may, I consider it entirely out of my province to enter into either negotiation or discussion with you on them; and the more so, from having learned, since you called upon me, that the subject of your mission to these islands had been fully discussed between Rear Admiral Cockburn (before he left the coast of Florida) and Commissioners appointed by the Government of the United States; and that all persons then in possession of the British, who could possibly be considered as coming within the most liberal construction of the treaty, had been restored; and that the rear admiral's conduct and decisions had been fully approved by the late Commander-in-Chief, Sir Alexander Cochrane, at Cumberland island.

I shall not fail to transmit your letter to my Government; and it might, at the same time, be satisfactory for a copy of the authority under which you have come to these islands to accompany it, should you think proper to furnish me with one.

I need scarcely observe that it will be a loss of time your waiting here for the documents alluded to in the last paragraph but one of your letter, or visiting any other British islands or settlements for the purposes set forth in your said letter; for I can venture to assure you that there is not any authority at either competent to deliver up persons who, during the late war, placed themselves under the protection of the British flag, or property which may have been captured during the continuance of hostilities.

I am, sir, &c.

EDWARD GRIFFITH,
Rear Admiral, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated at LONDON, June 23, 1815.

I further observed that the British Admiral stationed in the Chesapeake had declined restoring slaves that he had taken, under a construction of the first article of the treaty which the Government of the United States considered erroneous, and which I presumed this Government would likewise so consider; that a reference to the original draught of the British projet, and to an alteration proposed by us and assented to by the British Plenipotentiaries, would immediately show the incorrectness of this construction. He said he thought it would be best to refer this matter to the gentlemen who were authorized to confer with us on the subject of a treaty of commerce. He asked me if Mr. Clay and Mr. Gallatin had communicated to me what had passed between them and this Government on that head. I said they had. After inquiring whether I was joined in that commission, he said that the same person had been appointed to treat with us who had concluded with us the Treaty at Ghent, and that Mr. Robinson, the Vice President of the Board of Trade, had been added to them. They had already had some conferences with Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, and their powers were now made out and ready for them to proceed in the negotiation.

LONDON, August 15, 1815.

SIR: The departure of Mr. Bagot having been some time delayed, and the private accounts from the United States received here indicating the actual continuance of Indian hostilities on the Mississippi and Missouri, I have thought it my duty, by an official communication to this Government, to press for the surrender of Michilimackinac, and to apprise them that payment would be claimed for the value of the slaves carried away in contravention of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent. I have the honor to enclose, herewith, a copy of my letter to Lord Castlereagh on this occasion. I had mentioned to him the subject of the slaves in my first interview, and he had then expressed an intention to refer it to the Commissioners with whom we were then negotiating the commercial convention; but they received no instructions relative to it, and considered their powers as limited to the objects upon which my colleagues were authorized conjointly with me to treat.

Extract from Mr. Adams's letter to Lord Castlereagh, dated

AUGUST 9, 1815.

MY LORD: In two several conferences with your Lordship, I have had the honor of mentioning the refusal of His Majesty's naval commanders, who, at the restoration of peace between the United States and Great Britain, were stationed on the American coast, to restore the slaves taken by them from their owners in the United States during the war, and then in their possession, notwithstanding the stipulation in the first article of the Treaty of Ghent that such slaves should not be carried away. Presuming that you are in possession of the correspondence on this subject which has passed between the Secretary of State of the United States and Mr. Baker, it will be unnecessary for me to repeat the demonstration that the carrying away of these slaves is incompatible with the terms of the treaty. But as a reference to the documents of the negotiation at Ghent may serve to elucidate the intentions of the contracting parties, I am induced to present them to your consideration, in hopes that the Minister of His Majesty, now about to depart for the United States, may be authorized to direct the restitution of the slaves conformably to the treaty, or to provide for the payment of the value of those carried away contrary to that stipulation, which, in the event of their not being restored, I am instructed by my Government to claim.

The first projet of the Treaty at Ghent was offered by the American Plenipotentiaries, and that part of the first article relating to slaves was therein expressed in the following manner:

"All territory, places, and possessions, without exception, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any other public property; or any slaves or other private property."

The projet was returned by the British Plenipotentiaries with the proposal of several alterations, and, among the rest, in this part of the first article, which they proposed should be so changed as to read thus:

"All territory, places and possessions, without exception, belonging to either party, and taken by the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, or any slaves or other private property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty."

It will be observed, that in this proposal, the words "originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the ratifications of this treaty," operated as a modification of the article as originally proposed in the American projet. Instead of stipulating that no property, public or private, artillery or slaves, should be carried away, they limited the prohibition of removal to all such property as had been originally captured in the forts and places, and should remain there at the exchange of the ratifications. They included within the limitation private as well as public property; and had the article been assented to in this form by the American Plenipotentiaries, and ratified by their Government, it would have warranted the construction which the British commanders have given to the article as it was ultimately agreed to, and which it cannot admit; for, by a reference to the protocol of conference held on the 1st of December, 1814, there will be found among the alterations to the amended projet, proposed by the American Plenipotentiaries, the following:

"Transpose alterations consisting of the words 'originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty,' after the words public property."

"Agreed to by the British Plenipotentiaries."

It thus appears that the American Plenipotentiaries admitted, with regard to artillery and public property, the limitation which was proposed by the British projet, but that they did not assent to it with regard to slaves and private property; that, on the contrary, they asked such a transposition of the words of limitation as would leave them applicable only to artillery and public property, and would except slaves and private property from their operation altogether; that the British Plenipotentiaries and Government, by this proposed transposition of the words, had full notice of the views of the other contracting party, in adhering to the generality of the prohibition to carry away slaves and private property, while acquiescing in a limitation with respect to artillery and public property. With this notice, the British Government agreed to the transposition of the words; and accordingly, that part of the article as ratified by both Governments now stands thus:

"All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the island herein-after mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property, originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

From this view of the stipulation, as originally proposed at the negotiation at Ghent, as subsequently modified by the proposals of the respective Plenipotentiaries, and as finally agreed to by both the contracting parties, I trust it will remain evident, that, in evacuating all places within the jurisdiction of the United States, and in departing from their waters, the British commanders were bound not to carry away any slaves, or other private property of the citizens of the United States, which had been taken on their shores. Had the construction of the article itself been in any degree equivocal, this statement of the manner in which it was drawn up would have sufficed to solve every doubt of its meaning. It would also show that the British Plenipotentiaries were not unaware of its purport, as understood by those of the United States, and as I am instructed to urge its execution.

J. Q. ADAMS.

LORD CASTLEREAGH.

Great Britain—Deportation of Slaves.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

August 22, 1815.

Referring, then, to the contents of my letter of the 9th instant to Lord Castlereagh, which he had seen, I told him (Lord Liverpool) that, having expected Mr. Bagot was on the eve of his departure, I had been anxious that he might go provided with instructions which might give satisfaction to the Government of the United States with regard to the execution of two very important stipulations in the Treaty of Ghent. He said that, as to the surrender of Michilimackinac, there could be no sort of difficulty. The orders for its evacuation had been long since given. It was merely the want of barracks for their troops that had occasioned a momentary delay, and he had no doubt that the fort had been before this delivered up. There never had been for a moment the intention, on the part of the British Government, to retain any place which they had stipulated to restore. But, with respect to the slaves, they certainly construed very differently from the American Government the stipulations relating to them. They thought that it applied only to the slaves in the forts and places which, having been taken during the war, were to be restored at the peace. I said that, independent of the construction of the sentence which so strongly marked the distinction between the artillery and public property, and slaves and private property, the process by which the article had been drawn up, demonstrated, beyond all question, that a distinction between them was intended and understood by both parties. The first projet of the treaty had been presented by us. This had been required, and even insisted upon by the British Plenipotentiaries. The article was, therefore, drawn up by us, and our intention certainly was to secure the restoration both of the public and private property, including slaves, which had been in any manner captured on shore during the war. The projet was returned to us with a limitation upon the restoration of the property, whether public or private, to such as had been in the places when captured, and should remain there at the time of the evacuation. We assented to this so far as regards artillery and public property, which, by the usages of war, is liable to be taken and removed, but not with regard to private property and slaves, which we thought should, at all events, be restored, because they ought never to have been taken. We, therefore, proposed the transposition of the words, as stated in my letter to Lord Castlereagh. The construction upon which the British commanders have carried away the slaves would annul the whole effect of the transposition of the words. Artillery and public property had, of course, been found, and could, therefore, be restored almost or quite exclusively in the forts or places occupied by troops. But there was not, perhaps, a slave to carry away in all those which were occupied by the British when the treaty was concluded; and to confine the stipulation relating to slaves within the same limits as those agreed to with regard to public property, would reduce them to a dead letter. He said that perhaps the British Plenipotentiaries had agreed to the transposition of the words there at Ghent, without referring to the Government here; and that, although the intention of the parties might be developed by reference to the course of the negotiations, yet the ultimate construction must be upon the words of the treaty as they stood. He would see Mr. Goulburn, and inquire of him how they understood this transposition; but certainly, for himself, (and he could speak for the whole Government here,) he had considered them only as promising not to carry away slaves from the places which were occupied by their forces, and which they were to evacuate. There were, perhaps, few or no slaves in the places then occupied by them, but there was a probability, at the time when the treaty was signed, that New Orleans and other parts of the Southern States might be in their possession at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. If they had understood the words to imply that persons who, from whatever motive, had taken refuge under the protection of the British forces, should be delivered up to those who, to say the least, must feel unkindly towards them, and might treat them harshly, they would have objected to it. Something else (he could not say what) would have been proposed. I said I had referred to the progress of the negotiation and the protocol of conferences, only as confirming what I thought the evident purport of the words of the treaty. To speak in perfect candor, I would not undertake to say that the British Plenipotentiaries had taken a view of the subject different from that of their Government; but certainly we had drawn up the article without any anticipation that New Orleans or other Southern ports, not then in their possession, would, at the ratification of the treaty, be occupied by them. Our intentions were to provide that no slaves should be carried away. We had no thought of disguising or concealing those intentions.

Had the British Plenipotentiaries asked of us an explanation of our proposal to transpose the words, we should certainly have given it; we evidently had an object in making the proposal, and we thought the words themselves fully disclosed it. Our object was the restoration of all property, including slaves, which, by the usages of war among civilized nations, ought not to have been taken. All private property on shore was of that description. It was entitled, by the laws of war, to exemption from capture. Slaves were private property. Lord Liverpool said that he thought they could not be considered precisely under the general denomination of private property; a table or a chair, for instance, might be taken and restored without changing its condition, but a living and human being was entitled to other considerations. I replied that the treaty had marked no such distinction; the words implicitly recognised slaves as private property in the article alluded to—"slaves or other private property." Not that I meant to deny the principle assumed by him: most certainly a living, sentient being, and still more a human being, was to be regarded in a different light from the inanimate matter of which other private property might consist. And if, on the ground of that difference, the British Plenipotentiaries had objected to restore the one while consenting to restore the other, we should readily have discussed the subject; we might have accepted or objected to the proposal they would have made. But what could that proposal have been? Upon what ground could Great Britain have refused to restore them? Was it because they had been seduced away from their masters by the promises of British officers? But had they taken New Orleans, or any other Southern city, would not all the slaves in it have had as much claim to the benefit of such promises as the fugitives from their masters elsewhere? How, then, could the place, if it had been taken, have been evacuated according to the treaty, without carrying away any slaves, if the pledge of such promises was to protect them from being restored to their owners? It was true, proclamations inviting slaves to desert from their masters, had been issued by British officers. We considered them as deviations from the usages of war. We believed that the British Government itself would, when the hostile passions arising from the state of war should subside, consider them in the same light; that Great Britain would then be willing to restore the property, or to indemnify the sufferers by its loss. If she felt bound to make good the promises of her officers to the slaves, she might still be willing to do an act of justice by compensating the owners of the slaves for the property which had been irregularly taken from them. Without entering into a discussion which might have been at once unprofitable and irritating, she might consider this engagement only as a promise to pay to the owners of the slaves the value of those of them which might be carried away. Lord Liverpool manifested no dissatisfaction at these remarks, nor did he attempt to justify the proclamation to which I particularly alluded.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Monroe, dated LONDON, September 5, 1815.

In compliance with your instructions, I have this day addressed Lord Castlereagh, claiming payment from the British Government for the slaves carried away from Cumberland island and the adjoining waters, after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, and in contravention to one of the express stipulations of that treaty.

My preceding despatches, Nos. 9 and 10, will have informed you of the steps I had taken by an official letter to Lord Castlereagh, and by a personal interview with the Earl of Liverpool, in relation to this subject, previous to the receipt of your last instructions. The letter to Lord Castlereagh has hitherto remained unanswered, and Lord Liverpool made no attempt to answer either the reasoning of your letter on the subject to Mr. Baker, or the statement of the proof with regard to the meaning of the article, resulting from the manner in which it had been drawn up and agreed to. The substance of what he said was, that, in agreeing to the article as it stands, they had not been aware that it would bind them to restore the slaves whom their officers had enticed away by promises of freedom.

The case of these slaves, carried away from Cumberland, seems not even to admit of the distinction to which Mr. Baker and Lord Liverpool resorted: yet the prospect of obtaining either restoration or indemnity appears to be not more favorable in this case than many others of the same class. If there were any probability that this Government would admit the principle of making indemnity, it would become necessary for me to remark that the list of slaves transmitted to me, and of which I have sent to Lord Castlereagh a copy, is not an authenticated document; it is, itself, merely a copy of a paper, under the simple signature of two persons, one of them an officer in the service of the United States, and the other apparently a private individual. It can scarcely be expected that the British Government, or, indeed, any other, would grant a large sum of indemnities upon evidence of this description. Neither could I feel myself prepared to bargain for the value of these slaves, according to a general conjectural estimate of their value. I have made the offer, under the full conviction that it will not be accepted. But if indemnity should ever be consented by this Government to be made, the claims are of a nature to be settled only by a Board of Commissioners, authorized to scrutinize, in judicial forms, the evidence in support of them. I have also thought it would give a further sanction to the claim, to advance it while offering still to this Government the alternative of restoring the slaves themselves.

Mr. Adams to Lord Castlereagh.

LONDON, Sept. 5, 1815.

MY LORD: In the letter which I had the honor of addressing to your lordship on the 9th of August last, I stated that I had been instructed by my Government to claim the payment of the value of the slaves carried away from the United States by the British naval commanders stationed on the American coast, notwithstanding the express stipulation to the contrary in the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, in the event that such slaves should not be restored to their owners.

The enclosed is a copy of a list of seven hundred and two slaves taken in the State of Georgia by the forces under the command of Rear Admiral Cockburn, and carried away after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace from Cumberland island, or the waters adjacent to the same, which has been transmitted to me by the Secretary of State of the United States, with a new instruction to claim the indemnity justly due to the owners, to the full value of each slave. Should His Majesty's Government now prefer to restore the slaves, who must yet be in their possession or that of their officers, it is presumed to be still practicable; but their removal having been in contravention of the express stipulation of the treaty, it is to the faith of Great Britain, pledged by that stipulation, that the United States can alone recur for indemnification to the owners for the loss of their property, if the slaves are not restored.

If it should be deemed expedient rather to make this compensation than to restore the slaves to their owners, I am authorized to enter into such arrangements as may be thought proper for ascertaining the amount of the indemnity to be made, and settling the manner in which it may be allowed.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Lord Viscount CASTLEREAGH, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Monroe, dated

LONDON, Sept. 26, 1815.

I have not yet received any answer to either of those which I addressed to Lord Castlereagh in relation to the slaves carried away in violation of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Adams to Lord Bathurst.

25 CHARLES STREET,
Westminster, October 7, 1815.

MY LORD: The documents of which I have now the honor of enclosing to your lordship copies, have been transmitted to me from the Government of the United States, with instructions to apply to that of His Majesty for the restitution of the slaves referred to in them, or for indemnity to their proprietor, Raleigh W. Downman, for the loss of them. In the cases which I have heretofore presented to the consideration of His Majesty's Government, and concerning which I am yet waiting for the honor of an answer, I have deemed it sufficient to state, in support of the documents furnished, the simple fact of the taking and carrying away of the slaves, and the appeal to the plain and explicit stipulation in the Treaty of Ghent, which has been thereby violated. But, in addition to these grounds of claim, it cannot escape your lordship's discernment, that in the present case there are circumstances which entitle it to peculiar regard, independent of the engagement in the treaty—these slaves having been taken and carried away by a British officer, while himself under the special and solemn protection of a flag of truce. The transaction, therefore, was in the nature of a breach of parole; marked not only with the exceptionable characters of depredation upon private property, but with the disregard of that sacred pledge of peace which is tacitly and universally understood to be given by the assumption of a flag of truce. To prescribe the restitution of property thus captured, no express stipulation could be necessary; yet the stipulation of the treaty applies likewise to the present claim in all its force. I am induced to hope it will meet with the immediate attention of His Majesty's Government.

I am happy to avail myself of the occasion to renew to your lordship the assurance of my highest consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Copy of a note from Lord Bathurst to Mr. Adams.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Oct. 9, 1815.

Earl Bathurst presents his compliments to Mr. Adams, and has the honor to inform him that His Majesty's Government will cause immediate inquiry to be made in the case of the slaves carried away by the officer of the flag of truce, as represented in Mr. Adams's note of the 7th instant.

Lord Bathurst requests Mr. Adams will accept the assurance of his high consideration.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated OCTOBER 31, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose copies of two papers received from Lord Bathurst, relative to the taking and carrying away of slaves from the United States by the British naval commanders, in violation of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and also by an abuse of the privileges allowed to a flag of truce.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Copy of a note from Lord Bathurst to Mr. Adams, dated

FOREIGN OFFICE, Oct. 24, 1815.

The undersigned, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Adams's letter of the 7th instant, with the documents therein contained, relating to eleven slaves, the property of Raleigh W. Downman, an American, stated to have been received on board and carried off in a flag of truce sent by Captain Barrie (when senior officer in the command of the British flotilla up the Rappahannock) to procure the release of a surgeon's assistant who had been made prisoner.

The undersigned has the honor to acquaint Mr. Adams, that Captain Barrie having been referred to, without loss of time, for such particulars as he might be enabled to give upon this subject, a statement to the following effect has been received from that officer, which the undersigned hastens to communicate to Mr. Adams.

Captain Barrie has not any documents with him to which he can refer, but he feels confident that he may trust to his memory on this occasion.

The letters marked A and B, transmitted by Mr. Adams, Captain Barrie believes to be copies of those which passed between the American commanding officer and himself.

He is certain that he never received the letter marked D, a copy of which is transmitted in Mr. Adams's letter, and has no recollection of any slaves ever having been received on board any flag of truce during the time he was intrusted with the command of the Chesapeake squadron; if such a circumstance did occur, it was without his knowledge or authority. Had such an event fallen under Captain Barrie's cognizance, he would (if the slaves had forcibly been taken from the shore) instantly have ordered them to be restored, and the officer so offending into confinement, till he could be brought to trial; if, however, the slaves had voluntarily sought British protection, and had once obtained a footing under the British colors, he should not have taken upon himself to allow them to be forced back into slavery, but should have waited the directions of the Commander-in-Chief. During the two winters that Captain Barrie was employed as senior officer in the Chesapeake, the slaves were constantly escaping from the shore, and joining the British ships; on these occasions their general practice was to show something to represent the white flag, and Captain Barrie thinks it not improbable (if any slaves were received on board the Franklin) that they may have escaped in the canoe, and have themselves hoisted the flag which has been sworn to.

Before the surgeon's mate was restored, Admiral Cockburn had arrived in the Chesapeake; and, if the letter D had ever reached the Admiral, Captain Barrie is of opinion it certainly would have been communicated to him.

Captain Barrie states that the masters of the slaves very frequently came off to the ships to claim them; on which occasions he uniformly left it to the slaves whether they would remain under British protection or return to their masters, and even allowed the masters to converse with their slaves apart from the ship's company.

The violation of a flag of truce was a very tender subject with Captain Barrie at the period in question, for he had a short time previous been engaged in correspondence with the commanding officer of the United States forces at Norfolk on want of respect paid to British flags of truce; one of his small four-oared boats, unarmed, with a large new white flag flying, having been wantonly fired on in open day, though the boat was proceeding to the place where the Americans had previously arranged that flags of truce should be received. One of Captain Barrie's men was killed when the boat was receding from the shore, with the flag of truce still flying. The boat was employed to land the servant of the Russian Secretary of Legation, who was on board the Dragon, waiting a passage to Europe. Captain Barrie remarks on Downman's memorial, that, till after the peace, a squadron was constantly in the Chesapeake; and that, though the Dragon had sailed, the letter D, if then in existence, could easily have been presented to the senior officers, either at Tangier island or Symhan bay. The Franklin (the vessel stated to have carried off the slaves) remained in the bay with the ship she was manned from—the Havana.

The undersigned trusts that, after a perusal of the above statement on the part of Captain Barrie, Mr. Adams will concur in the opinion that some mistake exists with respect to the conduct imputed to that officer. But the undersigned has the honor to acquaint Mr. Adams, that, in order to ascertain, as well as possible, the real state of the transaction, a communication will be made forthwith to Admiral Cockburn, for the purpose of obtaining further information upon the subject, with which he must have been acquainted, as it appears that he had arrived in the Chesapeake before the surgeon's mate was restored.

The undersigned requests Mr. Adams will accept the assurances of his highest consideration.
BATHURST.

Copy of a note from Lord Bathurst to Mr. Adams, dated

FOREIGN OFFICE, Oct. 24, 1815.

The undersigned, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, has had the honor to receive Mr. Adams's letters of the 9th of August and 5th of September last; the first of which recites the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and requires "that His Majesty's naval commanders, who, at the restoration of peace between the United States and Great Britain, were stationed on the American coast, should restore the slaves taken by them from their owners in the United States during the war, and then in their possession." This claim is set up in consequence of the following interpretation which is given to the first article of the said treaty by the Government of the United States, in as far as it relates to slaves and private property, namely: "That, in evacuating all places within the jurisdiction of the United States, and in departing from their waters, the British commanders were bound not to carry away any slaves, or other private property of the citizens of the United States, which had been taken upon their shores;" and it takes its origin from a different construction of the same article of the treaty by His Majesty's naval officers on the coast of America, who (according to Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Baker of the 1st of April) contend that "slaves and other private property are comprised under the same regulation with artillery and other public property; and that none ought, in consequence, to be restored, except such as were, at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, in the forts and places where they were originally taken."

The arguments brought forward by the American Government in support of their understanding of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent rest partly upon such collateral evidence as may be deduced from the intention of the negotiators at the time they drew up that article. The undersigned need not remind Mr. Adams of the inconvenience which would result, were the parties upon whom treaties are binding to recur to the intentions of the negotiators of such treaty, instead of taking as their guide the context of the treaty itself on any point of controversy respecting it.

The undersigned is, however, willing to waive this objection. In this instance, it would appear that the alteration in the original article proposed by the British Commissioners was introduced by a verbal amendment suggested by the American Plenipotentiaries. Many alterations of this kind took place, sometimes at the suggestion of one party, and sometimes of the other; but it surely is not meant to be inferred from this that a change of phrase, professedly verbal, is to be taken as necessarily denoting, or importing an admitted change of construction. It is certainly possible that one party may propose an alteration with a mental reservation of some construction of his own, and that he may assent to it on a firm persuasion that the construction continues to be the same; and that, therefore, he may conciliate, and yet concede nothing by giving his assent. The proposed alteration was considered as merely verbal; no suspicion appears to have been entertained that it changed the stipulation as originally introduced; and it is not averred that the American Plenipotentiaries then thought of the construction now set up by their Government. The meaning of the British negotiators is admitted to have been made quite apparent by their project; and as nothing passed indicative of any objections to it on the part of the American Commissioners, or of any departure from it by the British negotiators when the alterations were suggested by one party and acceded to by the other; and as there was no discussion on the propriety of making the restitution more extensive as to slaves and other private property than as to the other property mentioned, the undersigned cannot subscribe to the conclusions which Mr. Adams and his Government have drawn from this manner of viewing the subject. The undersigned will now proceed to examine that part of the subject which regards the construction that has been given to the context of the article in question by the Government of the United States.

By the first article of the treaty it is stipulated that "there shall be a firm and universal peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, of every degree, without exception of places or persons. All hostilities, both by sea and land, shall cease as soon as this treaty shall have been ratified by both parties, as hereinafter mentioned. All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property. And all archives, records, deeds, and papers, either of a public nature or belonging to private persons, which, in the course of the war, may have fallen into the hands of the officers of either party, shall be, as far as may be practicable, forthwith restored and delivered to the proper authorities and persons to whom they respectively belong. Such of the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy as are claimed by both parties shall remain in the possession of the party in whose occupation they may be at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, until the decision respecting the title to the said islands shall have been made, in conformity with the fourth article of this treaty.

"No disposition made by this treaty as to such possession of the islands and territories claimed by both parties shall in any manner whatsoever be construed to affect the right of either."

The main purport of the first article, in the former part of it, relates to the general pacification, and, in the latter part of it, to some of the direct consequences on the territorial possessions of the two countries, and the property within such possessions. As to the public property in the posts or places to be restored, it provides that, if it shall have the double condition annexed to it of having been originally captured therein, and of remaining therein when the ratifications are exchanged, then such property is to be restored, and it is not to be destroyed or carried away. It would surely have been unusual and unreasonable to have stipulated for the restitution of any property which never had belonged to the fort or place, or which had been already destroyed or carried away, so as no longer in fairness to have been considered as belonging to it; for it would seem to have no connexion with the subject-matter of that part of the article in which the stipulation concerning it must be supposed to occur. As to public property, it appears quite plain that the carrying away here spoken of is from the fort or place to which it belonged, and from no other; for the condition which is admitted to apply to that would otherwise have no application at all; and no sound reason can be given why the condition might not, in both its branches, apply as well to private as to public property, provided the construction would fairly admit of it. Both parties appear to agree as to the conditions which relate to public property. But then immediately follow, in the same sentence, the words "or any slaves or other private property;" and here the question is, whether slaves and other private property are to be restored under the same limitation provided in the same article, and in that part of it which immediately precedes the words in question, or whether they are to be restored under different provisions? In the first place, the words do not admit of, nor is it contended by either party that there is any distinction whatever made in this article between slaves and other private property. They are incontestably placed on the same footing; and whatever stipulations in this article apply to slaves, as one description of private property, must, of necessity, apply equally to all other private property referred to in the article. The question then is, under what conditions is it stipulated that private property (slaves inclusive) is to be restored? If it be contended that, by the position of the words in this article, private property is released from all the conditions under which it is admitted that public property is to be restored, the restitution becomes in that case unconditional. But Mr. Monroe does not contend for an unconditional restitution, and, therefore, seems to admit that the stipulation respecting private property is not a new and substantial stipulation, independent of preceding words; but that the words "carrying away," which, in the preceding part of the sentence, apply to the restitution of public property, apply equally to the restitution of private property. But, if the words "carrying away" apply to private as well as public property, how entirely arbitrary it is to say that the intervening words do apply to the one, and do not apply to the other, although the words "carrying away" grammatically govern both.

Admitting, however, this arbitrary construction, still it would be more extensive than that for which Mr. Monroe contends; for, in that case, there would be no limitation assigned as to the place where the private property was originally captured, nor any limitation as to the place from whence the private property was not to be carried away. All merchant vessels, therefore, captured on the high seas, and their effects, must, according to this construction, be restored, even if they should not be within the limits of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. Neither would there be any limitation as to the time subsequent to which the carrying away is not to take place. It might be from the commencement of the war, or from the signature of the treaty, or from the exchange of the ratifications: whereas Mr. Monroe contends that the places where they had been originally captured, the places from whence they must not be carried away, and the period to which this limitation applies, are well ascertained by the first article. According to the construction of this article by the American Government, the private property in contemplation is limited to such as had been originally captured within the territories of the United States; and such property, so captured, must not be carried away after the exchange of the ratifications, nor from any place within the limits of the United States, whether this private property be at that period in American ports, or British ships-of-war, or British vessels. But if the first article provide for all these stipulations, one of them placing private property on the same footing as that on which, by the same, public property is placed, and the others establishing dissimilar conditions, it is impossible to look at those passages in this first article, which can alone be made to apply to such provisions, and not be at once satisfied that these limitations cannot be extracted, without such omissions and interpolations as the undersigned is persuaded that it is not the intention of the American Government to maintain. As to the application of this article to private property on shipboard, neither does the first article itself, nor did any discussion respecting it, express or refer to any such restitution of property remaining in British ships of war or British vessels. There are not only no words in the article which stipulate such a provision, but there is a provision in the second article which stipulates the contrary. By the second, the conditions are stipulated on which vessels and their effects are to be restored; they are to be restored if the vessels be not captured until after a given time from the exchange of the ratifications. If the vessels were captured previous to the time limited, neither they nor their effects are to be restored, wherever such vessels with their effects may be, although they should be within the limits of the United States; yet, according to the stipulations of the second article, which have a direct application to private property on shipboard, if they have been captured within a limited time, they may be carried away at any subsequent period, without reference to the exchange of the ratifications. To Mr. Monroe's observation, that destruction, in the first article, cannot apply to slaves, it might be sufficient to answer, that the expression may certainly apply to other private property, and that the stipulations which apply to one must apply to the other; but the observation is, in truth, not material to the question at issue, because the point in dispute is not with reference to private property carried away; which words, it is admitted, do apply to slaves and other private property. The question, then, seems to be this. Is that construction the true one which is the most simple and is grammatically correct, and was that which it is admitted one of the contracting parties intended, and against which the other did not at the time object? or is that construction to be adopted which was not at the time professed, and the words of the article do not express, and which is in contravention of the article which immediately follows it?

In this alternative, the undersigned has no hesitation in communicating to Mr. Adams that the British Government is under the necessity of adhering to the construction of the disputed point in the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, as set forth in this note, much as it has to regret that the construction should differ so widely from that of the Government of the United States.

The undersigned requests Mr. Adams to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

BATHURST.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

NOVEMBER 16, 1815.

It cannot be doubted that the British Government will make a just indemnity to the owners for the slaves who were carried from the United States by the British officers, in violation of the Treaty of Peace. The construction of the article, relating to this subject, given in my letter to Mr. Baker, and maintained with so much reason and force in your conference with Lord Liverpool, is that alone which can be admitted here. The palpable violation of the treaty by the British officers, in carrying those persons off, after the peace was proclaimed, from the presence of their owners, excited a sensibility which need not be described. A vigorous effort of the Government to obtain justice is claimed, and expected by them. Lists of the slaves taken from Cumberland island and Tangiers have already been forwarded, and lists of those taken from other parts will be forwarded when obtained.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

NOVEMBER 20, 1815.

It is not expected that the British Government will pay for any slaves who were carried from the United States, in violation of the treaty, of which satisfactory proof is not adduced. The proof applicable to those who were taken from Cumberland and Tangier islands will, I presume, be placed on the strongest ground; and I have no doubt that proof equally strong may be obtained of the removal of many others, who were carried off after the peace in British ships from other quarters. It is important that the principle be first established that the British Government will pay for the slaves carried off in violation of the treaty. The manner of liquidating the claims is the next point to be arranged. The mode suggested by you, the appointment of a Board of Commissioners, with full powers to investigate every case, is thought the most eligible—indeed, the only one that could do justice to the parties. This board ought to consist of one or more commissioners, to be appointed in equal number by each Government, and to hold its session in the United States.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, Feb. 8, 1816.

In adverting to the subject of the slaves, I reminded him [Lord Castlereagh] that there were three distinct points relating to them, which had been under discussion between the two Governments. The first, regarding the slaves carried away by the British commanders from the United States, contrary, as the American Government holds, to the express stipulation of the Treaty of Ghent. After referring to the correspondence which has taken place on this topic at Washington and here, I observed that the last note concerning it, which I had received from Lord Bathurst, seemed to intimate that this Government had taken its final determination on the matter; that I hoped it was not so; I hoped they would give it further consideration; it had been the cause of so much anxiety to my Government; it was urged so constantly and so earnestly in my instructions. The language of the treaty appeared to us so clear and unequivocal; the violation of it, in carrying away the slaves, so manifest; and the losses of property occasioned to our citizens so considerable, and so serious, that I would not abandon the hope that further consideration would be given to it here, and ultimately that satisfaction would be made to the United States on this cause of complaint. Lord Castlereagh said that he had not seen the correspondence to which I referred, but that he would have it looked up, and examine it. There was, I told him, a special representation concerning eleven slaves taken from Mr. Downman by the violation of a flag of truce sent ashore by Captain Barrie. I had also received from Lord Bathurst an answer relative to this complaint, stating that it had been referred to Captain Barrie for a report, and giving the substance of that which he had made. It did not disprove any of the facts alleged by Mr. Downman; but I must remark that Captain Barrie was himself the officer who had sent the flag of truce, and who was responsible for the violation of it; and that, as a general principle, it was scarcely to be expected that satisfaction for an injury could ever be obtained, if the report of the person upon whom it was charged should be received as a conclusive answer to the complaint. He said he supposed the complaint itself was only the allegation of an individual, and that, naturally, reference must be made to the officer complained of for his answer to the charge. I replied that the documents I had furnished copies of, in Mr. Downman's case, did not consist merely of his allegations; there were affidavits of several other persons—taken, indeed, ex parte, because they could not be taken otherwise—but they were full and strong to the points, both of the violation of the flag, and of the carrying away of the slaves. He said he did not know how they could proceed otherwise, unless the affair were of sufficient importance for the appointment of commissioners by the two Governments; but he had not seen the papers, and would look into them.

LONDON, February 17, 1816.

The note respecting the slaves carried away is a reply to that which I received from Earl Bathurst in October last, as an answer to your letter to Mr. Baker, and to my letters of the 9th August and 5th September last to Lord Castlereagh. A copy of Lord Bathurst's note was transmitted to you immediately after it was received. The determination to refuse all satisfaction for this glaring violation of the treaty appeared, by the note, to be so settled and peremptory, that I thought it would be most prudent to allow some interval of time to elapse previous to exposing all the distortion of facts and perversion of argument with which it abounded. I found, upon conversation with Lord Castlereagh, that he had seen none of the papers which had passed on this question during his absence in France, and this circumstance has afforded a proper occasion for urging the discussion again.

Mr. Adams to the Right Honorable Lord Viscount Castlereagh, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs.

NO. 13 CRAVEN STREET, Feb. 17, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, requests the attention of Lord Castlereagh to the letters which he had the honor of addressing to his lordship on the 9th of August and 5th of September last, in relation to the slaves belonging to the citizens of the United States, carried away by the naval commanders of the British forces from places within the United States subsequently to the peace between the two countries, and in violation of the engagement in the first article of the Treaty of Ghent.

In pressing this subject once more upon the consideration of His Majesty's Government, the undersigned deems it necessary to state the terms of the stipulation in the treaty, and the facts in breach of it, constituting the injury for which he is instructed to ask redress from the justice and good faith of the British Government.

The stipulation of the treaty is as follows:

"All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the lands herein-after mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; or any slaves or other private property."

The facts in violation of this stipulation are, in evacuating sundry places within the United States which had been taken by the British during the war, the British naval commanders did carry away great numbers of slaves belonging to citizens of the United States. In his letter of the 5th of September the undersigned had the honor of enclosing a list of seven hundred and two slaves carried away, after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, from Cumberland island and the waters adjacent, in the State of Georgia, by the forces under the command of Rear Admiral Cockburn, with the names of the slaves and those of their owners, citizens of the United States. A number, perhaps still greater, were carried away from Tangier island, in the State of Virginia, and from other places, lists of whom and of their proprietors the undersigned expects to be enabled in like manner to produce. The only foundation which these naval commanders have alleged for this procedure was a construction of the paragraph containing this stipulation, so contrary to its grammatical sense and obvious purport, that the undersigned is well assured if the same phrase had occurred in any municipal contract between individuals, no judicial tribunal in this kingdom would entertain for a moment a question upon it; a construction under which the whole operation of the words "slaves or other private property" was annihilated, by extending to them the limitation confined by the words of the treaty to artillery and public property.

In addition to the unequivocal import of the words, the undersigned, in his letter of the 9th of August, adduced the manner in which the article had been drawn up, discussed, and finally agreed upon, at the negotiation of the treaty, to prove that intention of the parties had been conformable to the plain letter of the article. It was intimated in the answer to his two letters which he had the honor of receiving from Earl Bathurst, that some inconvenience might result if the parties upon whom treaties are binding were to recur to the intentions of the negotiators of such treaty, instead of taking as their guide the context of the treaty itself on any point of controversy respecting it. In reply to which, the undersigned observes that his letter did not recur to the intentions of the negotiators, but to the intentions of the parties to the treaty, as manifested in the process of drawing up and agreeing to the article; and not even to them instead of the context of the treaty itself, but to support and maintain the context of the treaty against what he deemed a misconstruction equally at variance with the rules of grammar and the intentions of the parties.

It is observed, in Lord Bathurst's answer, that in this instance, the article as it stands was agreed to by a verbal amendment suggested by the American Plenipotentiaries to the original article proposed by the British Commissioners. Far otherwise; the original article was proposed by the American, and not by the British Plenipotentiaries. The original article proposed that, in evacuating the places to be restored, no property, public or private, artillery or slaves, should be carried away. An alteration was proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries, and its object was to limit the property to be restored with the places, to such as had been originally captured in the places, and should be remaining there at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. The reason alleged for this alteration applied only to public property. It might be impracticable to restore property which, though originally captured in the places, might have been removed from it before the exchange of the ratifications.

But private property, not having been subject to legitimate capture with the places, was not liable to the reason of the limitation; to which the American Plenipotentiaries, therefore, assented only so far as related to artillery and public property; they did not assent to it as related to slaves and other private property. It was not a mere verbal alteration which they proposed; they adhered, in relation to slaves and other private property, to their original draught of the article, while they consented to the proposed alteration with regard to artillery and public property. To this qualified acceptance the British Commissioners agreed. Nor need the undersigned remind Lord Castlereagh that the British Plenipotentiaries did not sign the Treaty of Ghent until this article, as finally agreed to, and every other important part of the treaty, had been submitted to the British Government itself, and received their sanction and approbation.

If Lord Bathurst had taken this, which is presented as the true view of the circumstances under which the article in question was drawn up and adopted, the undersigned is persuaded that he would have been spared the necessity of adverting to the following passage of his Lordship's answer, in which the undersigned trusts that some error of a copyist has left its meaning imperfectly expressed.

"It is certainly possible that one party may propose an alteration, with a mental reservation of some construction of his own, and that he may assent to it on the firm persuasion that the construction continues to be the same; and that, therefore, he may conciliate, and yet concede nothing by giving his assent."

The only sense which the undersigned can discover in this sentence, as it stands, is that a party may conciliate, and yet concede nothing, by assenting to an alteration insidiously proposed by himself. Impossible as it is that such could have been Lord Bathurst's real meaning, the undersigned is equally unwilling to believe that his Lordship intended to insinuate that, in the case of the stipulation now in question, an alteration was, on the part of the United States, proposed with a mental reservation of a construction not then avowed, which was assented to by Great Britain with a firm persuasion that, under the alteration, the construction would remain the same. The undersigned must be allowed to say that there was nothing in the transaction referred to which could justify such an insinuation; that the article, as originally drawn by the American Plenipotentiaries, and presented to the British Government, was plain and clear; that it admitted of no other construction than that for which the American Government now contends; that it avowedly and openly contained a stipulation that, in the evacuation of all the territories, places, and possessions to be restored, no slave should be carried away; that an alteration was proposed by the British Plenipotentiaries, which was accepted only in part; that in this partial acceptance the British Government acquiesced—the undersigned will certainly not say with a mental reservation to make up, by a subsequent construction of their own, for the part to which the United States did not assent; but he does deem it his duty to say, that when Great Britain proposed an alteration to that, of the meaning of which there could be no doubt, and when the alteration was accepted conditionally, and under a modification to which she agreed, she was bound to perceive that the modification, thus insisted upon by the other party, was not a mere verbal change in the phraseology of her proposal, but, so far as it extended, a substantial adherence to the original draught of the article.

It is further urged, in Lord Bathurst's answer, that the construction contended for by the American Government is inconsistent with another article of the treaty; for that it would require the restoration of the merchant vessels, and their effects, captured on the high seas, even if they should not be within the limits of the United States at the time of the exchange of the ratifications. The undersigned is not aware how such an inference can be drawn from anything that has passed between the two Governments on the subject. Merchant vessels and effects captured on the high seas are, by the laws of war between civilized nations, lawful prize, and, by the capture, become the property of the captors. It was never asserted by the American Government that the stipulation in question could mean that, in evacuating the places taken, within the territorial jurisdiction of either party, the other should be precluded from carrying away his own property. But as, by the same usages of civilized nations private property, is not the subject of lawful capture in war upon the land, it is perfectly clear that, in every stipulation, private property shall be respected, or that, upon the restoration of places taken during the war, it shall not be carried away; the meaning of the expressions is defined by the subject-matter to which they relate, and extends only to the property of the party from whom the place was taken, or of persons under his allegiance. But in the present case it will not be pretended that the slaves, whose removal is complained of as a breach of the compact, were the property either of His Majesty, of the naval officers in his service who carried them away, or of any of his subjects. They were the property of citizens of the United States—precisely the species of property which it was expressly stipulated should not be carried away; and, far from setting up now, as is suggested in Lord Bathurst's note, a construction not thought of when the treaty was formed, the American Government do but claim the performance of the stipulation in the only sense which could be applied to it at that time. That the British Government gave it then any other construction, was not only never communicated to the Government of the United States, but was impossible to be foreseen by them. When Great Britain had solemnly agreed, without hinting an objection, to the principle of restoring captured slaves, it could not be foreseen that the engagement would be narrowed down to nothing by a strained extension of them—of a condition limited, by the words of the treaty, to another species of property. It was impossible to anticipate a construction of an important stipulation which should annihilate its operation. It was impossible to anticipate that a stipulation not to carry away any slaves would, by the British Government, be considered as faithfully executed by British officers in carrying away all the slaves in their possession.

The undersigned concludes with the earnest hope that His Majesty's Government, reviewing the subject in the spirit of candor and of justice, will accede to the proposal which he has been instructed to offer, and make provision to indemnify the owners of slaves which were carried away in contravention to the engagement of the treaty.

He has the honor of renewing to Lord Castlereagh the assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Monroe, dated

LONDON, March 13, 1816.

I now enclose a copy of the note sent to Lord Castlereagh, concerning the slaves taken from

Great Britain—Deportation of Slaves.

Mr. Downman, by the violation of a flag of truce sent by Captain Barrie. You will have seen, by Lord Bathurst's note, a copy of which was transmitted to you immediately after it was received, that Captain Barrie disclaims all knowledge of the fact that the slaves were taken. As it appears by the documents that one of the slaves escaped from Bermuda and returned to his master, it may probably be in Mr. Downman's power to furnish many further particulars which may be of essential use in the prosecution of this inquiry, such as the name of the vessel to which they were first sent from the flag; how, and by what vessel, and when, they were afterwards sent to Bermuda, and into whose charge they were delivered there; perhaps, even the name of the officer who bore the flag; and whether Jeffery, the surgeon's mate, for whom the flag was sent, was on board the Franklin while the slaves were there; or whether they had already been sent on board another vessel before he embarked. Barrie's statement and Lord Bathurst's note seem intended to cast doubts upon the very fact of the slaves having been taken.

[N. B. A copy of the above was sent to Mr. Downman, but no answer has been received.]

Mr. Adams to Lord Viscount Castlereagh, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs.

13 CRAVEN STREET, March 12, 1816.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, has the honor of inviting the attention of Lord Castlereagh to a letter which, on the 7th of October last, the undersigned addressed to Earl Bathurst, in relation to eleven slaves, the property of Raleigh W. Downman, a citizen of the United States, alleged to have been taken and carried away by the violation of a flag of truce sent by Captain Barrie, commander of His Majesty's ship Dragon. With this letter were enclosed copies of Mr. Downman's memorial to the President of the United States, representing the facts, and of several other documents to substantiate them; to all which the undersigned now begs leave to refer Lord Castlereagh.

The undersigned had the honor of receiving from Lord Bathurst an answer to this letter, acquainting him that Captain Barrie himself had been immediately referred to for such particulars as he might be enabled to give upon this subject, and communicating the substance of his report upon this reference.

There are many particulars in this statement of Captain Barrie, which, appearing to have no bearing upon the special object of inquiry, and tending rather to draw the attention from it to other points of discussion, might with propriety be left unnoticed, but for the insinuations that they convey. He remarks, for instance, that, at the period in question, the violation of a flag of truce was a very tender subject with him; and he refers to a previous correspondence in which he had been engaged with the commanding officer of the United States forces at Norfolk, on want of respect paid to British flags of truce, upon occasion of one of his own having been fired upon. The undersigned might deem it sufficient to say, that this was not the subject upon which Captain Barrie was called for information. As the Captain does not recollect the violation, by his own people, of the flag sent by himself, he did not mean to allege it as a retaliation upon that of which another flag sent by him had been the sufferer. Yet he avows that, if slaves, fugitives from their masters, had been received on board a flag sent by himself, he would not have restored them to their owners without an express order from his Commander-in-Chief: a tenderness for a flag of truce upon which the undersigned forbears to comment.

Of the particular incident asserted by Captain Barrie, the undersigned has no cognizance; but, so far as this part of that officer's narrative may be understood as intending an imputation upon American officers or the American Government, of disrespect to the sacred character of a flag, the undersigned will only remind Lord Castlereagh of the repeated offers made by the Government of the United States during the war, and by the American Plenipotentiaries at the negotiation of peace, to punish every infraction of the most liberal laws of war, on their part, and to indemnify, as far as possible, every sufferer under them. It was in the power of Great Britain to have accepted these offers, on the single condition of reciprocity. The correctness of two of the documents transmitted by the undersigned to Lord Bathurst, and marked A and B, is admitted by Captain Barrie. He declares that he never received the document marked D—a circumstance acknowledged in Mr. Downman's memorial, and accounted for by the statement, that before a vessel could be procured to bear the flag with this letter, the British vessels had left the Chesapeake.

With regard to the violation of the flag of truce, and taking and carrying away of the slaves, Captain Barrie states, in general terms, that he has no recollection of any slaves ever having been received on board any flag of truce, during the time he was intrusted with the command of the Chesapeake squadron; and that if such a circumstance did occur, it was without his knowledge or authority.

The fact of the violation of the flag, and of the taking and carrying away of the slaves, is testified in the papers transmitted to Earl Bathurst, by the depositions, upon oath, of four witnesses; and His Majesty's Government did not consider the transaction as duly investigated, or that justice had been done to the complaining party, merely because Captain Barrie had stated the fact not to be within his recollection or knowledge. It was mentioned in Lord Bathurst's note that a communication would forthwith be made to Admiral Cockburn, for the purpose of obtaining further information upon the subject, with which, it is added, he must have been acquainted, as it appears that he had arrived in the Chesapeake before the surgeon's mate was restored.

Great Britain—Deportation of Slaves.

The undersigned can urge no objection to any source of information to which His Majesty's Government may deem it expedient to resort for ascertaining the facts to their own satisfaction; but he thinks it proper to suggest that there are other sources which might also tend to the elucidation of the facts. Perhaps Captain Barrie could indicate the name of the officer by whom he sent the flag. Mr. Jeffery, the surgeon's mate, whose restoration was the object of the flag, and who actually returned with it, might give some light upon the subject. The captain and officers of the Havana must be supposed to know something of the affair. But, independently of the recollection of all officers, themselves so materially and so pointedly interested in the result of the inquiry from the documents transmitted by the undersigned, it appears that one of the slaves made his escape from the island of Bermuda, and returned to his master. Information respecting the others might, then be easily obtained by the British Government from Bermuda. That the slaves were taken, the undersigned believes cannot admit of a doubt. How they were disposed of, is a question interesting to the solicitude which His Majesty's Government have felt upon an allegation which has been considered as implicating the character of British officers. The violation of a flag constitutes, in this instance, an aggravation which seems to call, with peculiar energy, for a complete and unequivocal investigation. The undersigned is persuaded that His Majesty's Government will feel it to be due to the complaint of the individual, to the honor of their officers, and to their own sense of justice.

He has the honor of renewing to Lord Castlereagh the assurance of his high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

LONDON, March 30, 1816.

I have the honor to enclose copies of a note which I have received from Lord Castlereagh, with a report from Sir George Cockburn to the Secretary of the Admiralty, Mr. Croker, concerning the taking and carrying away of Mr. Downman's slaves. You will not fail to perceive that the admiral, like Captain Barrie, disclaims all knowledge of the transaction whatever, and that the effort and tendency of both their letters is to excite doubts with regard to the truth of Mr. Downman's statement in his memorial to the President. I have no doubt it will be easy, and beg leave to suggest it may be very important to Mr. Downman, to furnish additional evidence of the facts and particulars which may lead to the disclosure how and why the transportation, in broad day, of eleven slaves, to the British squadron, and by them to Bermuda, could be effected without the knowledge of either of the British commanding officers.

J. Q. ADAMS.

SECRETARY OF STATE.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 26, 1816.

The undersigned has had the honor of receiving Mr. Adams's note of the 11th instant, respecting the slaves asserted by Mr. Downman to have been carried away from his estates by a flag of truce, contrary to the usages of war.

The undersigned has now the honor of transmitting to him a report which has been recently received from Rear Admiral Sir George Cockburn; and as soon as the further reports which the Admiral has promised to make upon the arrival of Captain Hamilton at the anchorage off St. Helena shall be received, the undersigned will not fail to communicate it to Mr. Adams, being not less anxious than himself upon a case in which a flag of truce is stated to have been violated.

The undersigned begs to renew to Mr. Adams the assurance of his high consideration.

CASTLEREAGH.

JOHN Q. ADAMS, Esq., &c.

Admiral Cockburn to Mr. Croker.

NORTHUMBERL'D, (St. Helena Roads,)

February 9, 1816.

SIR: With reference to Mr. Barrie's letter (No. 15) of the 3d of November, and its enclosures, respecting certain slaves stated to have been carried away from the American shore within the Chesapeake, by a British flag of truce, in the month of December, 1814, I lose no time in begging you to acquaint their Lordships that I have no knowledge whatever of such transaction, nor is mention made of any such in my various documents of that period, though His Majesty's ships then in the Chesapeake, and on the adjacent coasts, were all acting under my immediate orders, and, consequently, made all their reports to me.

Mr. Downman's memorial to Mr. Madison induces me, however, to mention to their Lordships that, from my first entering the Chesapeake, in March, 1813, until the conclusion of the war, the said inland navigation was never left without several of His Majesty's ships; and when I quitted it in December, 1814, with a part of the squadron, I left there three frigates and two sloops under the orders of Captain Clavelle, of the Orlando, with whom communications from the land were held by means of flags of truce, from one extremity of its shores to the other, as will appear by two of the paragraphs extracted from letters I received about the same period from that officer, (herewith enclosed;) and the first paragraph will show (in reply to a part of Colonel Chawning's letter) that it was not uncustomary to trust the tender in question (which was the one attached to and manned from the Havana) up the Rappahannock river with hostile views. After the proclamation, which was issued on this subject, the slaves were constantly coming, at all risks, to our ships, tenders, and boats, &c., for protection, which occasioned our squadron to be visited by Americans under flags of truce, asking the restoration of these unhappy people, under various pleas; and I cannot help thinking that, if the transactions in question had really taken place, as set forth by Mr. Downman, it would have come before me, either through Captain Clavelle or through some other channel, previous to quitting the station, as I continued not only upon the coast, but actually on shore in America, until after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, and was to the last in the habit of receiving letters on such subjects from all parts of the country, Washington not excepted.

The Havana being now upon this station, and it being possible that some of the officers and people who were in the tender may be still on board the frigate, I will, whenever she returns to this anchorage, cause Captain Hamilton to make every inquiry and report to me thereupon; and I shall not fail to transmit it to their Lordships by the earliest opportunity afterwards, at which time I will also return the several papers which have been transmitted to me referring thereto.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE COCKBURN.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, April 15, 1816.

Since this interview with Lord Castlereagh, I have received from him a note respecting the slaves carried away from the United States after the ratification of the peace. A copy of it is enclosed. To reply to it at present would be to no purpose. I shall wait for your further instructions.

Copy of a letter from Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Adams.

APRIL 10, 1816.

The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Adams's note of the 17th of February, claiming, on behalf of the United States, all such slaves belonging to their citizens as had been carried away by the naval commanders of the British forces from places within the United States, subsequently to the peace between the two countries.

The grounds upon which His Majesty's Government felt themselves compelled to withhold their acquiescence in the claim of the United States, as preferred in Mr. Adams's former note of the 9th of August, have been already fully explained by Lord Bathurst in his communication of the 2d of October. It does not, therefore, appear to the undersigned to be requisite again to discuss at any length the construction of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent. Agreeing entirely in the arguments urged by Earl Bathurst on this subject, the undersigned can never admit that construction of the article to be the true one, which would apply to the restoration of slaves a different rule from that applicable to private property; or which, admitting that the restoration of private property, slaves inclusive, is to be subjected to some limitations, applies to it a different degree of limitation from that conveyed in the words immediately preceding.

His Majesty's Government have always been ready to admit the most liberal construction of the article in question. They have never pretended to resist the claim of the United States to indemnification for slaves or private property belonging to their citizens, which can be proved to have been in places directed to be restored by the Treaty of Ghent, at the date of the exchange of the ratifications, and to have been afterwards removed. But they do, and must ever deny that the United States can have any claim to property not actually in the places which, by the stipulations of the treaty, were to be restored at the time specified therein; because such a claim is utterly inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty, and is equally unsupported by anything which passed in the discussion of that treaty, or even by the original project of that treaty, as offered by the American negotiators.

That project, indeed, required that the places should be restored, without carrying away any private property. If it had been, then, intended to provide for the restoration of all private property originally captured in the places, instead of prohibiting its removal, the article would have positively enjoined the restoration. What had been previously removed could not become the subject of the prohibition; for not being in the place to be restored, it could not be carried away. Under this project, therefore, a removal previous to the ratification of the treaty was admitted, to bar the claim of the United States, without reference either to the distance to which the property had been removed, to the actual state of the property, whether on shipboard or on British territory, or to the length of time which had elapsed since its removal.

The undersigned, therefore, considers it impossible to maintain that the insertion of the words "originally captured in the said places, which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty," (words which must be admitted, at least, of a restrictive nature,) can have given to the original proposition of the American Plenipotentiaries a greater latitude than it originally possessed.

The undersigned trusts that the Government of the United States will, upon these considerations, not be disposed further to urge the general claim to indemnification which was the subject of Mr. Adams's former notes. Animated with a sincere disposition to act towards all Powers with the strictest justice and good faith, His Majesty's Government will be most happy to attend to any representation on the part of the United States which may have for its object the restoration or indemnification for the loss of property of her citizens actually removed from places within the territory of the United States subsequent to the ratification of the Treaty of Ghent. But, at the same time, the undersigned cannot consider any property which had been, previous to the ratification of the treaty, removed on shipboard, as property forming a subject of such representation.

State of the Finances.

The undersigned begs to renew to Mr. Adams the assurances of his high consideration.

CASTLEREAGH.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adams, dated

MAY 21, 1816.

Should the British Government persevere in its construction of the first article of the late Treaty of Peace, respecting slaves carried off in violation, as we presume, of its obvious import, the President is willing to refer the question to the decision of some friendly Power, which you will propose. A reference is suggested, by provisions in the treaty, applicable to anticipated differences in other instances; indeed, where such differences exist, no better mode can be adopted for settling them in a satisfactory manner. In this instance the interest is too important to be neglected. It is impossible that the opinion of the British Government can be more decided than that of the United States. There is no reason, therefore, why the United States should yield to the opinion of Great Britain, more than that Great Britain should yield to that of the United States.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Lord Castlereagh, dated

SEPTEMBER 17, 1816.

"4th. Slaves carried away from the United States by British officers after the peace."

As the construction given by His Majesty's Government to the first article in the Treaty of Ghent, in reference to the slaves carried away from the United States by British officers, after the ratification of peace, is so directly at variance with the construction which the American Government think alone applicable to it, the undersigned has been further instructed to propose that this question should be submitted to the decision of some friendly sovereign. This reference is suggested by provisions in the Treaty of Ghent itself, applicable to the contingency of differences in other instances; and it is conceived that, when such differences exist, no better mode can be adopted for settling them in a satisfactory manner.

Viscount Castlereagh to Mr. Adams.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1816.

SIR: I very much regret that the absence from London, at this season of the year, of several of the Prince Regent's Ministers, will preclude me from returning as early an answer to your note of the 17th as I should wish, under the sense I entertain of the great importance of the several objects to which it invites the attention of this Government.

I have myself obtained the permission of the Prince Regent to make a short excursion to Ireland on my private affairs; but I shall certainly return to London by the middle of November, and shall lose no time, as soon after that period as my colleagues shall be reassembled, to bring the various subjects referred to in your note under their deliberation.

I request you will accept the assurance of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

[Communicated to Congress, December 3, 1816, by the President of the United States in his annual Message, of which the following is an extract.]

"For a more enlarged view of the public finances, with a view of the measures pursued by the Treasury Department previous to the resignation of the late Secretary, I transmit an extract from the last report of that officer. Congress will perceive in it ample proofs of the solid foundation on which the financial prosperity of the nation rests, and will do justice to the distinguished ability and successful exertions with which the duties of the Department were executed, during a period remarkable for its difficulties and its peculiar perplexities."

Extract of a report of the late Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to submit to the President of the United States the following general sketch of the finances, with reference to the 1st of August, 1816, comprehending—

- I. A view of the sources of revenue, and the objects of public expenditure;
 - II. A view of the fiscal measures during 1816.
- I. A view of the sources of revenue, and the objects of public expenditure.

REVENUE.

The return of peace enabling the Legislature to alleviate the burdens imposed by the necessities of the war, Congress, during the last session, discontinued or reduced the following duties and taxes:

1. The acts imposing duties upon articles of domestic manufacture were repealed.
 2. The act imposing duties on furniture and watches was repealed.
 3. The duties imposed on licenses to retailers of foreign merchandise, &c., were reduced.
 4. The duties imposed on spirits distilled within the United States were reduced, and the collection modified.
 5. The rates of postage were reduced.
 6. The direct tax was reduced from $6,000,000 to $3,000,000, and imposed for one year only.
 7. The double duties on merchandise imported were discontinued, and a new tariff established.
- The discontinuance and reduction of the duties

State of the Finances.

and taxes (independent of the impost) may be estimated at the annual amount of $8,000,000 with the contingent diminution of $3,000,000 more, if the direct tax should not be continued after the year 1816.

But the remaining sources of revenue were ample for the maintenance of the public credit, and the prosecution of a liberal and provident policy. They consist—

1. Of the customs, including the duty upon salt, according to the new tariff of duties.
2. Of the direct tax imposed for 1816.
3. Of internal duties on stamps;

Ditto	on licenses to retail;
Ditto	on spirits distilled;
Ditto	on refined sugar;
Ditto	on carriages and harness;
Ditto	on sales at auction.
4. Of postage.
5. Of the product of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and other miscellaneous receipts.
6. Of the proceeds of the sales of public lands.

To these sources of revenue must be added the auxiliary authority to issue Treasury notes, of various denominations, and to raise money upon loan. The authority was necessary in anticipation of the revenue, throughout the year 1815, to meet the arrearages of the war expenditure; to discharge the floating public debt of Treasury notes and temporary loans; and to pay the instalment of the principal, and the interest of the public funded debt. But the Treasury would no longer require the aid of loans or Treasury notes, if the facilities for transferring its funds from place to place had not been destroyed when the national currency became extinct.

The Committee of Ways and Means have heretofore estimated the annual product of the customs, according to the new tariff of duties, at about the sum of $17,000,000, and, although for the present year the amount will be much greater, in consequence of the late excessive importations, the estimate of the committee may be accepted as a just measure of the permanent annual product of the customs for the purposes of the Peace Establishment. The annual product of the direct tax, the internal revenues, and the sales of public lands have, in like manner, been estimated at about the sum of $7,000,000; making, upon this general view, and supposing a continuance of the direct tax, a permanent annual income of $24,000,000.

EXPENDITURE.

It is not intended, in this preliminary view of the objects of the public expenditure, to embrace the temporary objects arising from the war, but those only of a permanent nature upon a Peace Establishment, which have heretofore been estimated at an annual aggregate of about $24,000,000.

1. For civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses.
2. For military expenses, including the Indian Department, and the armament of the militia.
3. For the naval expenses, including the annual appropriations for the purchase of timber, and the gradual increase of the navy.

4. For the instalment and interest payable on funded public debt.

It is proper to remark that temporary loans and Treasury notes, issued under the authority of acts, passed prior to December, 1814, were chargeable on the Sinking Fund; but as the current revenue will afford the means to satisfy those demands, in the course of a few months, the floating debt is not enumerated with the objects of annual expenditure.

It is also proper to remark that the principal of the Louisiana stock is reimbursable at the Treasury of the United States in four annual instalments, commencing in 1818; and that, by the operation of the Sinking Fund, the old six per cent. stock will be extinguished in 1818, the deferred stock in 1824, and the Louisiana stock in 1822. The stock created on account of the war debt is charged upon the Sinking Fund, and becomes redeemable at various periods between the years 1825 and 1828.

For the details, connected with this general view of the resources of the revenue, and the objects of public expenditure, it is sufficient to refer to the annual report from the Treasury Department, dated the 6th of December, 1815, the report on the subject of the new tariff of duties, dated the 12th of February, 1816, and the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated the 9th of January, 1816. The sequel of the present sketch of the finances will likewise serve the purposes of explanation and illustration.

II. A view of the Fiscal Measures during 1816.

In various communications from this Department to Congress, the injurious effects of the suspension of payments in coin upon the administration of the finances have been anxiously represented. For the immediate object of the present report it is proper to repeat some of them:

1. The Treasury has been compelled to accept the payment of the duties and taxes in the local currency of the respective places of payment.

The comparative value of the local currencies appeared, in some degree, to render this course of payment unequal; but the alternative was either to adopt it, or to abandon the hope of collecting the revenue in any convertible medium for satisfying the public engagements. The rule was, therefore, declared that the Treasury would receive and pay in the notes of banks circulating at par at the respective places of receiving and paying. For a time, the test of the fact that the notes did circulate at par was the agreement of the banks, employed as the depositories of the public revenue, to credit them as cash in the Treasurer's accounts; but when the principal banks withdrew that accommodation, and refused to credit, as cash, any bank notes but those which they had themselves respectively issued, the fact of the circulation at par was necessarily left to its own notoriety, and the official responsibility of the collectors. Few notes, except the notes of the local banks, continued to circulate at par; and such as did so circulate were received by the banks upon special deposit for safe-keeping, constituting a discredited fund, upon which the Treasurer could only occasionally draw.

The operation of this measure was, undoubtedly, severe in many of the collection districts, particularly in the States where the banks, preparing for the resumption of coin payments, had so reduced the issues of their paper as to render the circulating amount insufficient for the demand. But it was not in the power of the Treasury to dispense with the general rule. If notes, not circulating at par, had been received in one district, they must have been received in every district; and there existed no mode of discriminating between notes to be received, and notes to be rejected, either as to the bank, or the place, at which they were issued. The inevitable consequences must have been that the duties and taxes would everywhere be paid in the most depreciated paper; and that the medium thus received could never be employed to discharge the demands upon the Treasury, even at the places of receiving it. The revenue would accumulate in the Treasury only to perish there; while the expedient, of substituting Treasury notes to meet the public engagements, led to an indefinite augmentation of the national debt.

2. The Treasury has been compelled to augment the amount of national debt, both funded and floating, by issues of Treasury notes to meet the public engagements at places where it could not command the local currency.

Throughout the Eastern States the Treasury has hitherto failed to command an amount of the local currency equal to the amount of the local demands. The banks of those States, fettered by the stipulations of their charters, could not follow the example of the banks of the other States in the suspension of coin payments; but their issues of notes have been very limited, and the necessities for a circulating medium have been principally supplied by Treasury notes, and partially by the notes of the Bank of New York. Under these circumstances the revenue in the Eastern section of the Union has been, almost entirely, collected in Treasury notes. Inferior difficulties, from similar causes, have occurred in some of the Southern States; where, also, the accruing revenue was less in proportion to the demands which the arrearages of the war, as well as the current expenditures, pressed upon the Treasury.

From these considerations it is obvious that the public credit could only be maintained, and the public service could only be effected, even with an ample revenue, with the use of the auxiliary means afforded to the Treasury, in the authority to borrow money and issue Treasury notes. Little use, however, has been made of the authority to borrow since the closing of the loan of 1815; but the warrants of the War and the Navy Departments, as well as the dividends payable on the public funded debt, have required a considerable issue of Treasury notes. The Treasury notes bearing interest, and fundable at six per cent. have been generally disbursed in payment for services and supplies; and the Treasury notes, not bearing interest, but fundable at seven per cent., have been generally disbursed in payments on account of the funded debt, and the compensation of members of Congress. The effect of these measures will be more particularly stated hereafter.

Thus it cannot escape observation that a cause unconnected with the late war, and which exists without the agency or the authority of the Government, will probably so augment the amount of the funded and floating debt as to render nugatory the estimates and calculations which have been made on other occasions in relation to that subject. The restoration of a uniform national currency can alone terminate this evil.

3. The Treasury has been involved in the difficult and delicate task of designating the medium in which the warrants drawn by the heads of Departments should be respectively paid.

The revenue is collected throughout the Union, but the amount of the collection is very different in different places; and it has happened, not unfrequently, that the demand for payment was the greatest where the means of payment were the least. The rule, which has already been mentioned, was applied, whenever it was practicable, by directing warrants to be paid at the places of rendering the services, or furnishing the supplies, for which they were respectively granted. But if the Treasury possessed no funds at those places the differences of exchange rendered it extremely difficult to locate the payment of the warrants in a manner equitable, impartial, and satisfactory. For some months after the war the Treasury was scantily supplied with the local currency of every place, except the District of Columbia and the city of Baltimore; and, consequently, during that period, the warrants which could not be discharged at the seat of the original transaction were paid in the currency of the District or of Baltimore. The progressive accumulation of the revenue opened a wider scope for payments, enabling the Treasury to draw next upon the banks of Philadelphia, and, more recently, upon the banks of New York. The public funds in the banks of the Southern and Western States having, also, become generally adequate to the local demands, it may now be considered that the active resources of the Treasury are co-extensive with the Union, excepting always the Eastern section. The difficult task of locating the payment of warrants still, however, continues, and must continue, as long as the differences of exchange shall operate. It is fiscally impossible to pay all the demands upon the Treasury at one place, and every holder of a warrant is naturally desirous to be paid at the place where the medium is of the highest current value. Under such circumstances it is to be expected that individuals will sometimes feel disappointment and express dissatisfaction; but it has been the constant and anxious endeavor of the Treasury to perform its arduous task, in the exercise of a sound discretion, guided by the requisitions of the departments, by the origin and nature of the debt, and by the state of the public funds.

4. The Treasury has been compelled to increase the number, and extend the range of banks employed as the depositories of the public revenue, with consequences unavoidably inconvenient and injurious.

As soon as the differences of the current value of bank notes were introduced, and particularly when one bank refused to credit as cash a deposit of notes of another, the Treasury was drawn to a choice of expedients; that is, either to take the hazard of accumulation of masses of revenue in the hands of the individual collectors and receivers, or to recognise, as places of deposit, the banks (being, however, banks of unquestioned solidity) established in the districts which were most affected by the course of the exchanges. Many powerful reasons led to an adoption of the latter measure; instructions were issued to the collectors and receivers to act accordingly; and the number of banks thus necessarily employed by the Treasury from Maine to Louisiana may be stated at ninety-four.

To the inconveniences incident to this multiplication of the places of deposit, was added the complexity inevitably arising from the various kinds of paper in circulation as money upon some of which minute calculations were required. Generally speaking the Treasury has with each bank four accounts:

An account of cash, meaning (in the absence of coin) the local currency.

An account of special deposits of bank notes, being notes issued by banks other than the depository.

An account of special deposits of Treasury notes bearing interest.

An account of deposits of small Treasury notes not bearing interest.

Owing to this untoward condition of the machinery for the collection, custody, and distribution of the revenue, to the great extension of the business of receipts and expenditures, and to several accidental causes, the punctual statement and settlement of the Treasurer's accounts have been found practicable. To expedite and facilitate, however, the accomplishment of that object proceedings have been instituted to withdraw the Treasury notes from the banks, for the purpose of cancelling them; to ascertain the character of the bank notes upon special deposit, for the purpose of claiming payment, or an effective credit from the banks which issued them; and to induce the banks of the interior to transfer the Treasurer's balances, from time to time, to the banks of the commercial cities on the Atlantic, for the purpose of a periodical settlement: the success of these proceedings, the operation of the Bank of the United States, the collection of the revenue in the lawful currency, and, above all, the improvements contemplated by Congress in the constitution of the Department, are objects of high and urgent importance, demanding constant vigilance and care.

The successive attempts made by this Department to relieve the administration of the finances from its embarrassments have been ineffectual. There was no magic in a mere Treasury instruction to the collectors of the revenue, which could, by its own virtue, charm gold and silver again into circulation. The people, individually, did not possess a metallic medium, and could not be expected to procure it, throughout the country, as well as in the cities, by any exertion unaided by the banks. And the banks, too timid, or too interested, declined every overture to a co-operation for reinstating the lawful currency. In this state of things the Treasury, nay, the Legislature, remained passive. The power of coercing the banks was limited to the rejection of their notes in the payment of duties and taxes, and to the exclusion of their agency in the custody and distribution of the revenue; but the exercises of that power would not generate a coin currency; although it would certainly act oppressively upon the people, and put at hazard every sum of money which was due to the Government. Until, therefore, a substitute was provided for the paper of the banks, it would have been a measure of useless and impolitic severity towards the community to insist that all contributions to the expenses of the Government should be paid in medium, which, it is repeated, the community did not possess, and could not procure.

The opinion here expressed has been the opinion of all the States, except the Eastern States. In the Southern and Western States the payments in coin had been suspended; and in most of them the notes of the local banks constituted the general circulating medium; for the Treasury note medium circulated, almost exclusively, in the commercial cities. The obvious difference between the situation of the Eastern section, and the other sections of the Union, naturally produced a difference of interests, and of dispositions, upon the question of resuming payments in coin. The Eastern section urged the measure at all hazards. The other sections, and particularly the middle section, objected to it; each bank professing, nevertheless, a willingness to adopt it, upon a simultaneous and general movement of the banks, directed to that object. With respect to the Eastern section, a peremptory requisition for a return to payments in coin would have left the circulating medium, for the ordinary uses of the people, much the same, in quantity and kind, whether the distant banks conformed to it or not. But, with respect to the other sections, such a requisition, if the local banks did not conform to it, must have deprived the people of their only means of paying the public taxes, and of transacting the pecuniary business of life. It was not, then, an insensibility to the pernicious course of banking which had, of late, been pursued, nor a disposition to relinquish the cardinal policy of restoring the lawful national currency, that induced this Department, during the year 1815, to acquiesce in the state of the currency, such as it was found when the present Secretary was appointed, and such as it had been left by Congress, after the deliberations of a six months session, but the acquiescence (painful as it was) proceeded entirely from a sense of duty to the Government, and of justice to the community; from a solicitude to preserve the public revenue, as well as to prevent private distress; and from a conviction that the legislative wisdom and authority were alone competent to provide the means of removing the great evil that existed, without incurring the danger of introducing a greater evil.

The result of the proceedings of the last session of Congress has justified the opinion, and realized the hope which was formed. The establishment of the Bank of the United States will open the sources of a uniform currency, independent of the State banks; and, as the people will be thus supplied with a medium, which can be used for every public and private purpose, the peremptory requisition of the resolution of Congress, for the collection in the lawful money of the United States after the 20th of February, 1817, becomes at once just, politic, and practicable.

The steps which were taken to organize the Bank of the United States, the early and satisfactory completion of its subscriptions to its capital, and the advertisement appointing the 28th of the ensuing October for the election of directors by the stockholders, have been, heretofore communicated to the President, together with the letter which was addressed to the Bank Commissioners at Philadelphia, recommending that they should provide a place, and materials, proper and requisite for commencing the operations of the institution, as soon as the directors shall be chosen. The general solidity of the subscribers as capitalists, and the extensive distribution of the stock, throughout the Union, have confirmed the public hope and confidence in the competency of the bank to accomplish the great objects for which it is established.

As soon as it appeared, upon reasonable calculation, that the subscription to the capital of the Bank of the United States would be filled, a proposition was offered for the consideration of the State banks for commencing the payments of small sums in coin, on the 1st day of October next, upon principles, which, with the approbation of all the members of the Administration, were stated in the report made to the President on the 24th June, 1816. The terms of the resolution of Congress seemed, indeed, to require from the Treasury Department an effort to facilitate the restoration of the lawful currency, even before the 20th of February, 1817; and, short of a general return to that currency, nothing was thought more likely to be acceptable and useful than the proposition in question. But the effort has failed. The State banks, with few exceptions, have deemed a partial resumption of coin payments inexpedient; and the banks of the Middle States (New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland) have intimated that, about the 1st of July, 1817, will be the proper period for resuming the banking operations on the basis of a metallic capital.

The rejection of the Treasury proposition is regretted. Upon principle there is no good reason why a debtor should not pay a part of his debts although he cannot pay the whole; nor why he should refuse to pay his small debts, because he cannot pay the large. Upon experience, banks (for instance, at this epoch, the Bank of England) have been in the practice of paying coin for their notes of a low denomination, while they refused that kind of payment for notes of a high denomination; and, upon policy, it is clear that the payment of small notes in coin would soon beget confidence in bank paper of any amount; and, consequently, render a general payment in coin easy and safe. The quantity of small notes abroad, the probability of a run through that medium upon the banks, and all the terrors which bankers and brokers may feel or imagine, will furnish no argument against the proposition for a partial resumption of coin payments at this time, which will not be more forcible against a general resumption at all times. But it is impossible to pass from disease to health without some suffering; and the banks cannot expect to recover from the disorders of the present banking system without encountering risks, and impairing profits. The rejection of the proposition has, however, constrained the Treasury to limit its exertions to preparatory arrangements for the general collection of the revenue in the lawful currency after the day prescribed by the Legislature.

But referring the period, for a general resumption of payments in coin, to a day so distant as the 1st of July, 1817, (several months subsequent to the time prescribed by Congress for the collection of the revenue, in the lawful currency, as well as the time when the operations of the Bank of the United States might be expected to commence,) is a measure of the most serious character, indicating a dangerous reliance of the State banks upon a change in the policy, or a relaxation in the energy of the legislative authority. Its effects, if unresisted, or if fostered by a temporising disposition on the part of the Government, must be to embarrass the Bank of the United States in the onset; to confine the issues of the notes of the national bank to the amount of the coin in its vaults, to deprive the people of the means of complying with the resolution of Congress for the collection of the revenue in coin, and to preserve to the State banks an illegitimate control over the money and currency of the nation. To the wisdom, patriotism, and virtue of Congress, therefore, an appeal must be made; nor can it be supposed that the State authorities will remain insensible to so calamitous a state of things. The powers of the Government, vigorously and steadily exercised, are ample for redress and relief; and it is yet hoped that the State banks will perceive and avoid the ruinous consequences to which the threatened conflict inevitably exposes them. The second instalment to the subscriptions of the United States being paid, the price of gold and silver being obviously in a rapid course of reduction, the means possessed by the banks to reinstate their metallic capitals being faithfully applied to that object, a spirit of mutual conciliation and good will actuating the national and State institutions, and, in short, a solid found-dition of public confidence being thus laid, what have the State banks to apprehend from a return to coin payment when the national bank shall commence similar payments, (say in January next,) or when similar payments shall be exacted from the people in the collection of duties and taxes, on the 20th of February, which will not be equally operative on the 1st July, 1817? The sincerity, and the honor of the directors of the State banks, who have proposed the last date as the proper period for all the important reform contemplated, will not be impeached or doubted; but there is no legal obligation to conform to the proposition; and the occurrence of new incidents, or the perception of other views, may, hereafter, be thought to justify a change of council and of conduct. There is, then, no security for the Government, or the community, but in the inflexible adherence to the system which Congress has adopted.

Having reviewed the general course of the Treasury, as connected with the state of the currency, it becomes proper to exhibit more particularly the fiscal results; 1st, in relation to the appropriations and payments for the year 1816; 2dly, in relation to the receipts at the Treasury in 1816; 3dly, in relation to the public debt; and, 4thly, in relation to the miscellaneous business of the Department. It must, however, be remembered that, until the accounts of the Treasurer shall be finally balanced and settled, the statements, which have been officially furnished by the Register for the immediate purposes of the present report, are to be regarded in the light of estimates, subject to such changes as the ultimate examination of the accounting officers may produce. But it is not believed that any essential variance will occur.

1st. Of the appropriations and payments for the year 1816.

The demands authorized to be made by acts of appropriation on the Treasury for the year 1816, (independent of the unsatisfied balances of appropriations for former years, not carried to the surplus fund,) amounted to the sum of - $32,475,303 93

For the Civil Department, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous expenses, the sum of	-	-	-	-	$3,540,770 18
For the Military Department	-	-	-	$794,250 75
Arrearages	-	-	-	8,935,372 00
					16,729,622 75
For the Naval Establishment	-	-	-	-	4,204,911 00
For the public debt	-	-	-	-	8,000,000 00
					$32,475,303 93

The payments made at the Treasury, on account of the above appropriations, stated to the 1st day of August, 1816, amounted to the sum of - 26,332,174 89

For the Civil Department, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous expenses the sum of	-	-	-	-	$1,829,015 02
For the Military Department	-	-	-	$4,235,236 75
Arrearages	-	-	-	8,935,372 00
					13,170,608 75
For the Naval Department	-	-	-	-	1,977,788 50
For the public debt, ($1,354,762 62, being part of the balance of the preceding year's appropriations,)	-	-	-	-	9,354,762 62
					$26,332,174 89

To be credited, however, with the sum of $1,354,762 62, taken as above stated, from the last year's balance of appropriations for the public debt - $6,143,129 04

But it is estimated that the demands on the Treasury, from the 1st of August to the 31st December, 1816, will amount to to the sum of - $12,413,524 33

For the Civil Department, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous expenses	-	-	-	-	$1,629,494 90
For the Military Department	-	-	-	-	3,579,236 66
For the Naval Department	-	-	-	-	2,986,432 77
For the public debt, including the payment to be made on the 1st of January, 1817	-	-	-	-	4,218,360 00
					$12,413,524 33

And the unexpended balance of the appropriations for 1816, amounting only, as above stated, to the sum of - 6,143,129 04

There is a general deficit in the appropriation, for which provision must be made by law, amounting to the sum of - 6,270,395 29

State of the Finances.

Connected with these statements it may be useful to add, that, of the appropriations granted prior to the 1st of January, 1816, there remained on that day, unexpended, the sum of - $7,972,277 86

For the Civil Department, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous expenses	-	-	-	-	-	$2,562,363	51
For the Military Department	-	-	-	-	-	20,222	66
For the Naval Department	-	-	-	-	-	759,310	27
For the public debt	-	-	-	-	-	4,630,381	42
						$7,972,277	86

And at the end of the year 1816, the appropriation for the Military Department, the Naval Department, and the public debt will probably be exhausted; but there will remain an unexpended balance of the appropriations for the Civil Department, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous expenses, estimated at about the sum of - $2,642,623 77

2d. Of the receipts into the Treasury in 1816.

It is not within the scope of this report to enter into the details of that portion of the revenue which has accrued, but has not become payable, nor to distinguish between the amount produced under the old or war, or under the new or peace system of revenue. SUMMARY.

- First.* 1. From the foregoing estimates and statements, it appears that the receipts into the Treasury, (including the cash on deposit at the commencement of the year 1816,) from the 1st of January to the 1st of August, 1816, may be stated, subject to such alterations as shall occur in the final settlement of the Treasurer's accounts, at - - $45,825,920 67

Making an excess of receipts beyond the payments at the Treasury, from 1st January to 1st August, 1816, at - - - - $19,493,745 78

- Second.* 1. From the foregoing estimates and statements it appears that the receipts at the Treasury, as above stated, from the 1st of January to 1st of August, 1816, excluding the amounts in the Treasury at the first date, have amounted to - - $39,527,268 41
2. And that the probable receipts at the Treasury, from the 1st of August to the 31st of December, may be estimated at - - 19,876,710 40

A general statement of the sums paid monthly at the custom-houses for duties on merchandise imported into the United States, and of the sums repaid monthly upon debentures issued for the drawback of the duties on importation, has been prepared, embracing the period from March, 1815 to July, 1816, both months inclusive. From this document it appears,

1. That the aggregate of the duties received at all the custom-houses of the United States, during the above specified period, amounts to the sum of - - $28,271,143 50
2. That the aggregate of the debentures paid during the same period, amount to the sum of - - 2,624,421 66

Leaving the amount of duties, for the above specified period, (subject only to a deduction of the expenses of the collection,) at the sum of - - $25,646,721 84

3. That the aggregate of the duties received at the custom-houses of the United States, from March to December, 1815, both months inclusive, amounts to the sum of - $8,916,309 76
4. That the aggregate of the debentures, paid during last-mentioned period, amounts to the sum of - - 794,857 33

Leaving the amount of duties for the last-mentioned period, (subject only to a deduction for the expenses of collection,) at the sum of - - $6,121,542 43

5. That the aggregate of the duties received at all the custom-houses of the United States, from January to July, 1816, both months inclusive, amounts to the sum of $21,354,743 74
6. That the aggregate of the debentures, paid during the same period, amounts to the sum of - - 1,829,564 33

Leaving the amount of duties for the last-mentioned period, (subject only to a deduction for the expenses of collection,) at the sum of - - $19,525,179 41

State of the Finances.

The districts in the United States have contributed in very different proportions to the results, in the collection of the customs, which have been thus generally stated. The following abstract will afford a comparative view of the importations into some of the principal districts, (those whose importations have produced duties exceeding $400,000,) from March, 1815, to July, 1816, both inclusive.

DISTRICTS.	Duties.	Debentures.	Revenue subject only to expense of collection.
New York - - - - -	$9,926,188 30	$933,394 65	$8,992,793 65

NOTE.—This statement exhibits the amount of money actually paid into the Treasury at those ports, and not the amount of duties which accrued during that period.

3. Of the Public Debt.

In a supplement to the annual Treasury report of December, 1815, made to the House of Representatives on the 28th of February, 1816, it appears that the balance of the whole of the public debt contracted prior to the late war amounted on the 12th of February, 1816, to - $38,335,832 58

The amount which has since been reimbursed of the principal of the old six per cent. and deferred stocks, besides the payments of the interests, is the sum of - 556,558 26

And at this time the balance of the whole of the public debt contracted before the late war amounts to the sum of - $37,779,274 32

In the same supplemental report it further appears that the estimated amount of the whole of the public funded debt, contracted in reference to the late war, amounted on the 12th of February, 1816, to the sum of - 68,374,764 94

To this amount there has been since added the following items :

1. In six per cent. stock to pay the Bank of South Carolina, according to the contract for a loan made to General Pinckney, under the authority of the War Department, the amount being included in the appropriation for the military service - $43,956 04
2. In six per cent. stock to pay the Union Bank of Charleston, South Carolina, according to the contract for a like loan, the amount being included in the appropriation for the military service - 43,956 04
3. In six per cent. stock of 1815, in lieu of Treasury notes funded at 95 per cent. under the loan of 1815, and which thus operated to render the amount of the floating debt - 335,447 90
4. In six per cent. stock, in lieu of Treasury notes funded at par, (as far as has been ascertained,) and which thus operates to reduce the amount of the floating debt, estimated at - 9,200 31
5. In seven per cent. stock, in lieu of small Treasury notes funded at par, (as far as has been ascertained,) and which thus operated to reduce the amount of the floating debt, estimated at - 4,289,089 00

Amount of the addition since the 12th February, 1816, to the public funded debt, contracted in reference to the war - 4,721,649 29

Estimated amount of the whole of the funded debt at this time, contracted in reference to the late war - $73,096,414 23

In the same supplemental report it appears that the amount of the floating public debt on the 12th of February, 1816, was estimated at the sum of - $16,920,115 41

To this sum there has since been added the following items :

1. There have been issued and re-issued small Treasury notes, as is estimated at - $2,004,597 00

State of the Finances.

2. There having been issued Treasury notes bearing interest, as estimated at	2,861,900 00	4,873,498 00
3. There have been obtained temporary loans from the banks in the District of Columbia, under the act providing for the reconstruction of the public buildings, in addition to the loan of $100,000 stated in the supplemental report	$50,000 00
4. There has been obtained a temporary loan from the Farmers' Bank of Virginia to pay a warrant of the War Department in favor of the Governor of Virginia, to pay for militia expenses during the war	150,000 00	200,000 00
		$21,993,612 41

But the floating debt has been diminished since the 12th of February, 1816, in the following manner:

1. By the subscription of Treasury notes to the six per cent. loan of 1815, as above stated	$318,675 52
2. By funding Treasury notes at par for six per cent. stock, as above stated	9,200 31
3. By funding small Treasury notes for seven per cent. stock, as above stated	4,289,089 00
4. By the payment in Treasury notes of duties and taxes estimated to have amounted in Treasury notes bearing interest to the sum of	$7,217,853 58
In small Treasury notes, to	150,000 00
	7,367,853 58
5. By the repayment of temporary loans, viz:
To the Bank of Columbia, on account of the public buildings	$225,000 00
To the State of New York, on account of the militia, (principal)	350,000 00
To the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, (principal)	150,000 00
	725,000 00
		12,709,818 41

Estimated amount of the whole of the floating debt at this time - - - *$9,283,794 00

* Outstanding Treasury notes	$8,733,794 00
Temporary loans	550,000 00
	$9,283,794 00

A more general view of the issues and reimbursements of Treasury notes has been presented by the Register, to show the amount outstanding on the 1st August, 1816; from which it appears—

1. That the issues have been, under the act of Congress of June 30, 1812	$5,000,000 00
Do. do. do. of February 25, 1813	5,000,000 00
Do. do. do. of March 4, 1814	10,000,000 00
Do. do. do. of December 26, 1814	8,318,400 00
Do. do. do. of February 25, 1815—
Notes bearing interest	$4,422,400 00
Small Treasury notes, without interest	3,392,994 00
	7,815,394 00

Total amount of issues of Treasury notes - - - $36,133,794 00

2. That the reimbursements by payments, when the notes became due by subscription to the loan of 1815, and by satisfying duties and taxes, have amounted to	$29,467,407 16
Deduct estimated amount of interest, included therein	2,067,407 16
	27,400,000 00

Leaving an outstanding balance of Treasury notes of every denomination, on the 1st of August, 1816, amounting to the sum of - - - $8,733,794 00

The amount reimbursed, as above stated, including interest, being - - - $29,467,407 16

State of the Finances.

Consists of Treasury notes cancelled, including interest thereon, and in a course of cancelment at the Treasury, amounting to -	$12,904,986 00
And of Treasury notes, including interest deposited in the several banks to the credit of the Treasurer, as appears from his statement	16,562,421 16
	$29,467,407 16

The balance of $8,733,794, exclusive of interest thereon, is still subject to a reduction for the amount of Treasury notes in the hands of collectors and receivers, not deposited in the banks on the 1st of August, 1816. There can, therefore, be no doubt that, during the five subsequent months of the present year, the whole of the floating public debt in Treasury notes, as well as temporary loans, will be extinguished, agreeably to the anticipations which were expressed upon that subject.

From the preceding estimate it appears that, at this time, the aggregate amount of the public debt is the sum of - - - - - $120,159,482 55

Consisting of the following items:

1. Funded public debt before the late war - - -	$37,779,274 32
2. Funded public debt contracted since the late war - - -	73,096,414 23
3. Floating public debt outstanding - - -	9,283,794 00
	$120,159,482 55

The aggregate amount of the public debt, as is estimated on the 12th February, 1816, being the sum of - - - - - 123,630,692 93

The aggregate reduction since that period, amounts to the sum of - - - $3,471,210 38

The funded public debt will, unavoidably, be augmented, as long as the disordered state of the currency shall compel the Treasury to make any of its payments in small Treasury notes, fundable at seven per cent.; and the necessity of issuing Treasury notes, bearing interest, from the same cause, will also, in some degree, augment the funded debt, while it retards the extinguishment of the floating debt, for which the revenue is otherwise ample. To render the funds of the Treasury as active as possible, however, they have been applied to pay off the temporary loans by anticipation; those obtained in Boston and Maine (making together $550,000) being the only loans for which the local currency could not be provided. It would have been desirable, indeed, to have employed some of the public funds in the purchase of the public stock where it has fallen below par; but, upon examination, it was found that the appropriation for the Sinking Fund did not admit of that operation, for—

The balance of the appropriation of the preceding year applicable to the Sinking Fund, and remaining on the 1st of January, 1816, was - - - - - $4,630,381 42
And the appropriation for the year 1816 was - - - - - 8,000,000 00

Of which there was expended to the 30th of June, 1816 - - - $9,354,762 62
And the probable demand to the 1st of January, 1817, inclusive, is - 4,218,360 00
13,573,122 62

Leaving a deficit, which must be supplied as soon as the next session of Congress opens, amounting to - - - - - $942,741 20

Another item will be added to the public debt by the creation of the five per cent. stock, in payment for the shares held by the Government in the capital of the Bank of the United States; and it may be proper to bring into view the Mississippi stock, created upon the settlement of what are usually called "the Yazoo claims," amounting, on the 30th of August, 1816, to the sum of $4,241,725 80. It will be observed, however, that the five per cent. stock is, in effect, an exchange for another capital, producing probably a higher rate of interest; and that the Mississippi stock bears no interest, and is only eventually reimbursable out of the proceeds of the sales of public lands.

For the payment of the interest, both of the old and new debt, and for the reimbursement of the instalment of the principal of the old debt, due on the first of October next, provision has been made by the Treasury; remittances have also been made to the bankers of the United States in London and Amsterdam, for the payment of the interest on the Louisiana stock, payable at those places, respectively, on the 1st of July, 1816, and the 1st of January, 1817. And, so far as depends upon this Department, funds have been supplied to meet all the demands upon the Government of the United States, upon the various general accounts which are open there—

For the interest on the Louisiana stock;

State of the Finances.

For foreign intercourse, including the diplomatic fund ;

For the maintenance of prisoners of war ; and
For the support of American seamen in foreign countries.

4. Of the miscellaneous business of the Department.

The several important objects confided to the Department, independent of its merely fiscal duties, have received attention.

Without entering into a minute enumeration of them, the following are proper to be selected for notice :

1. The survey of the coast.—The necessary instruments having been secured, Mr. Hassler has been employed as the superintendent of the work, upon the principle and terms stated in his letter of instructions, dated the 3d of August, 1816.

2. The road from Cumberland to Ohio.—The course of the road having been confirmed by the President, from Cumberland to Uniontown, thence to Brownsville, thence through Washington and Alexandria to Wheeling, Colonel Eli Williams has been employed to survey and locate the road from Brownsville to Wheeling, as well as to examine the deviations which have been made by Mr. Shriver, from the route originally proposed by the Commissioners. Several plans have also been suggested for dividing the road into sections, and for expediting the work. But the difficulties which have arisen require immediate care and attention, and may be traced in the correspondence between this Department and Colonel Williams and Mr. Shriver.

3. The Custom-house establishment.—The 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1816, has appropriated $250,000 for custom-house establishments, upon a suggestion from this Department to the Committee of Ways and Means, with a view to the accommodation of the five principal commercial cities, to wit: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston. The only establishment previously owned by the Government was the custom-house at New Orleans. From the correspondence with the respective collectors, and reports which have been made to the President, it will appear that the purchase of a custom-house at Boston has cost

That a purchase has been authorized at New York, at a price not exceeding	55,000
That a purchase has been authorized at Philadelphia, at a price for the site, and the buildings to be erected, which will probably amount to	65,000
That a negotiation has taken place with the trustees for building an Exchange at Baltimore, who offer to erect and convey to the Government a suitable establishment, being part of the Exchange, for	70,000
And that a site and buildings may be purchased at Charleston for the sum of	50,000

$269,000

But the appropriation only amounts to 250,000

Leaving a deficit of - - $19,000

Upon this statement it is proposed to suspend the purchase at Baltimore until an additional appropriation can be obtained ; but to complete the purchase of the establishments in New York, Philadelphia, and Charleston, upon an enlarged scale, and more adequate to the growing commerce of those cities.

4. The Legislative calls for information.—Several resolutions were passed, during the last session of Congress, requiring information at the next session upon various subjects ; and arrangements have been made to enable the Department to report. The resolutions and correspondence on file will furnish you the particulars.

5. The case of Hoyt vs. Gelston et al.—In consequence of instructions issued from the Treasury Department, by authority of the President, the collector and surveyor of the port of New York seized the ship called the "American Eagle," under the charge of being illegally armed and equipped within the United States, for the purpose of waging hostilities against a friendly foreign Power. Upon a trial in the district court of New York the vessel was ordered to be restored, and the judge refused to grant a certificate that there was a probable cause of seizure. The owner brought an action of trespass against the seizing officers in the State courts, and recovered damages to the amount of $107,369 43. The cause has been transferred by order of the President from the court of errors in New York to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is now depending for a final judgment, and, probably, the judgment will be rendered at February term next. As the collector and surveyor acted in obedience to their orders, they appear to be entitled to an indemnity from the Government ; the subject was, therefore, submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, and a report was made by the committee in favor of the proposed indemnity. It is important that the report should be taken up and decided early in the next session. All the facts and proceedings in the case may be traced in the report of this Department to the Senate, during the session ending in 1816, and in the report to the Committee of Ways and Means during the session.

6. The direct tax of Georgia.—The Legislature of Georgia assumed the quota of the direct tax imposed upon that State for 1816 ; but the Governor did not give notice of the assumption, within the period prescribed by law, although the amount of the tax was remitted to the Treasurer in certain drafts, before the day fixed for paying it, in order to entitle the State to the abatement of fifteen per cent. Under these circumstances the gross amount of the quota has been paid into the Treasury, subject to the relief which Congress may hereafter provide.

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. J. DALLAS.

Of which sum it is estimated that $10,000,000 will be in cash, and the remainder in Treasury notes, principally issued under the act of the 24th of February, 1815, which cannot be reimbursed without an appropriation for that purpose.

Notwithstanding the favorable situation of the Treasury, the disordered state of the currency still continues to embarrass the fiscal operations of the Government. The expectation which had been formed, that the demands upon the Treasury, in the Eastern section of the Union, might be paid in the local currency by the end of the year, has not been realized. To discharge the claims in that quarter, arising from the interest and reimbursement of the public debt, which will be payable on the 1st of January next, small Treasury notes must be issued, or a temporary loan must be obtained from the Bank of the United States, to the amount of those demands. The latter alternative has been embraced, and a proposition for that purpose has been made to the bank, and has been favorably received by it.

When those claims are satisfied there will be no further embarrassment until the next quarterly payment of interest. To prevent the necessity of resorting again to loans for that object, the reissue of Treasury notes of all descriptions should be discontinued. When this course is adopted, and persevered in, the revenue in that quarter will be collected in current money, and will be more than sufficient to satisfy all the claims of the public creditors. The more certainly to effect that object, it is respectfully recommended that an appropriation be made, during the present session of Congress, for the reimbursement of the whole of the Treasury notes, issued under the act of the 24th of February, 1815. The Treasury notes issued under the preceding laws have either been reimbursed or provision made for that object during the last quarter of the year. The acts under which they issued having, by appropriations, provided for their reimbursement, no further appropriations are necessary for that purpose.

OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The funded debt contracted before the late war, which was unredeemed on the 1st of January, 1816, amounted, as per statement B, to		$38,340,906 77
By the same statement, it appears that the funded debt contracted on account of the late war, amounted, on that day, to		65,944,434 29
Making the whole funded debt, on the 1st of January, 1816, amount to		104,258,341 06
To which must be added temporary loans, viz:
Due the State bank, Boston	500,000 00
Cumberland bank, Maine	50,000 00
Banks in the District of Columbia	175,000 00
State of New York	350,000 00
		1,075,000 00
Making an aggregate amount, on that day, of		105,350,341 06
To this amount there has been added, between the 1st day of January, 1816, and the 30th of September, the following sums, viz:
6 per cent. stock of 1814	$229,801 31
6 per cent. stock of 1815	335,448 90
6 per cent. Treasury note stock	58,245 78

	1,871,639 76
		3,385,477 23
Making the whole public debt, on the 30th of September, 1816, as appears by statement C, amount to		108,745,818 29
Viz:—Old funded debt	37,494,267 01
New funded debt	71,201,551 28
Temporary loan	50,000 00
	108,745,818 29
Add the amount of seven per cent. stock, which it is estimated will be created during the last quarter of the year, by funding small Treasury notes		520,405 00
Makes the estimated amount of the public debt, on the 1st of January, 1817		109,266,223 29
The subscription to the Bank of the United States, on the part of the Government, will create five per cent. stock to the amount of		7,000,000 00
And the compromise with the Yazoo claimants has created stock to the amount of		4,098,615 29

But as the first is only an exchange for the same amount of bank capital, which will, probably, produce an excess of dividends beyond the interest payable on the stock, equal to the reimbursement of the principal, before the expiration of the charter, and the second bears no interest, and will, probably, be reimbursed by the sales of the public lands in the Mississippi Territory, during the three succeeding years, no further provision for their ultimate redemption appears to be necessary.

SINKING FUND.

According to the existing laws, the Sinking Fund consists of a permanent appropriation, $8,000,000 per annum, which is vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be by them applied to the payment of the interest of the public debt, and to the redemption of the principal. Of this sum there will be required, during the year 1817, for the payment of interest, $6,084,415 93; leaving the sum of $1,915,584 07 to be applied to the redemption of the principal of the debt. This sum, operating upon the principle of compound interest, will not redeem the whole amount of the funded debt before the year 1842. An attentive examination of the rise and progress of public debts in other countries cannot fail to impress the American Republic with the necessity of making suitable exertions, in periods of peace, to release the national revenue from so heavy an encumbrance. Although, from our happy form of Government, and from our fortunate geographical position, we may reasonably calculate upon being less frequently subjected to the calamities of war than has hitherto fallen to the lot of other civilized nations, yet reason and experience forbid the expectation that we shall be exempted from its evils until the redemption of the public debt shall be effected by the operation of the existing Sinking Fund.

By referring to the laws authorizing the several loans, which, during the late war, have swelled the public debt to its present amount, Congress has uniformly pledged the faith of the nation to provide sufficient funds for the payment of the interest, and the redemption of the principal of the debt so created. The time has now arrived when that pledge ought to be redeemed. It is, therefore, respectfully proposed, that there be annually appropriated the sum of $2,000,000, in addition to the sum of $8,000,000, now applicable to the payment of the interest, and the redemption of the public debt; and that that sum be vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to be applied in the same manner as the existing Sinking Fund. It is also proposed that when the six per cent. stock can be purchased at par, or the seven per cent. stock can be purchased at six per cent. premium, or when a greater amount can be redeemed, according to the conditions attached to the different loans, of which the funded debt is composed, than the amount of the Sinking Fund applicable to the redemption of the principal of the funded debt within any one year, there be paid to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund the further sum of $1,000,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if such payment can be made; leaving a balance in the Treasury, at the end of the year, of $2,000,000; which additional sum shall be applied to the redemption or purchase of the principal of the debt.

As the funded stock which may be subscribed by individuals to the Bank of the United States is redeemable at the will of the Government, and as the Louisiana stock is to be reimbursed in four annual instalments, commencing in the year 1818, the effect of the provision will be an annual addition of $1,000,000 for the succeeding six years, if the state of the Treasury will admit of its execution.

By the operation of the Sinking Fund, thus enlarged, the whole funded debt will be extinguished within the term of fourteen years. In the present unsettled state of the revenue, arising from the excessive importations of foreign merchandise during the previous and present year; from the change in the rate of duties imposed upon merchandise; and from changes made in the various branches of internal revenue, it would be unsafe to vest the whole of the surplus revenue of the present year in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, as there is strong reason to believe that the revenue which will accrue during the year 1817, will fall considerably below the permanent annual expenditure, inclusive of the addition proposed to be made to the Sinking Fund. That deficiency, as well as any other which may occur in the two succeeding years, will be covered by the balances which it is estimated will be in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1817 and 1818.

Of the estimate of the Public Revenue and Expenditures for the year 1816.

The probable authorized demands upon the Treasury, during the year 1817, are estimated to amount to	-	-	-	-	-	-	$21,751,797 57
Viz:—Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses	-	-	-	-	-	$1,705,513 03
Military service, (including an arrearage of $1,540,000,)	-	-	-	-	-	7,999,625 79
Naval service, (including $1,000,000 for the permanent increase of the Navy,)	-	-	-	-	-	3,986,658 75
Public debt	-	-	-	-	-	8,000,000 00

Deduct war arrearage	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,540,000 00
							20,211,797 57
Add for annual incidental expenses, not embraced in the estimate	-	-	-	-	-	-	288,202 43
							20,500,000 00
Making the permanent annual expenditure	-	-	-	-	-	-	3,000,000 00
To which add the sum proposed to the Sinking Fund	-	-	-	-	-	-	23,500,000 00
Making, in the whole, an aggregate amount for the permanent annual expenditure, until the public debt is redeemed, of	-	-	-	-	-	-	$23,500,000 00

The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the year 1815, estimated the revenue which would accrue during the year 1816, under the modifications proposed by that report to the existing laws for raising revenue, at - - - - - $25,600,000 00

State of the Finances.

Viz:—Customs -	-	-	-	-	-	$17,000,000 00
Internal duties -	-	-	-	-	-	4,500,000 00
Direct tax, (net proceeds,) -	-	-	-	-	-	2,700,000 00
Public lands -	-	-	-	-	-	1,000,000 00
Postage and incidental receipts -	-	-	-	-	-	400,000 00
						25,600,000 00

But the revenue which has actually accrued during the year is estimated, as already stated, at - 38,650,000 00

Making an aggregate excess, beyond the estimate of the last year, of - $13,050,000 00

Which excess has arisen, principally, in the customs.

By the same report, the money receivable into the Treasury during the year 1816, arising, principally, from revenue which accrued during the year 1815, was estimated at - $33,400,000 00

Viz:—Customs -	-	-	-	-	-	$21,000,000 00
Internal duties -	-	-	-	-	-	5,000,000 00
Direct tax -	-	-	-	-	-	6,000,000 00
Public lands -	-	-	-	-	-	1,000,000 00
Postage, and incidental receipts -	-	-	-	-	-	400,000 00
						33,400,000 00

But the actual receipts into the Treasury during the year, from those sources of revenue, are estimated at - 49,600,000 00

Leaving an excess of receipts beyond the estimate, of - $13,500,000 00

The actual excess in the customs, beyond the estimate of 1815, being - $15,000,000 00
In the internal duties, direct tax, and postage, there is a deficit of - 2,000,000 00

13,000,000 00
And an excess in public lands of - 500,000 00

Making, as before stated, the whole excess - $13,500,000 00

The comparative statements just presented prove the extreme difficulty there was, in 1815, of making any estimate upon which reliance could be placed. The excessive importations of foreign merchandise, during the past and present year, have, but in a slight degree, diminished that difficulty. The revenue which accrued from imports and tonnage during the three first quarters of the year 1816, have averaged $9,000,000 a quarter; while that which will have accrued during the last quarter is estimated at not more than one-third of that sum. As the redundancy of foreign merchandise in the country, which has produced this extraordinary reduction of duties in the fourth quarter of the year, will continue to influence the importations of the year 1817, the revenue accruing from that source, during the year, probably cannot be safely estimated above $12,000,000.

We must look, therefore, to the revenue accruing in the year 1818 as the average revenue arising from duties and taxes of a permanent character, by which the permanent expenditure of the Government should be regulated. From the facts in the possession of the Department, the revenue which will accrue during the year is estimated as follows, viz :

Customs -	-	-	-	-	-	$18,000,000 00
Internal duties -	-	-	-	-	-	2,500,000 00
Public lands -	-	-	-	-	-	1,500,000 00
Postage and incidental receipts -	-	-	-	-	-	250,000 00

Making an aggregate amount of - $22,250,000 00

In the year 1819, the first instalment of the bonus, payable to the Bank of the United States, becomes due - 500,000 00

During the same year it is believed that the claim of the State of Georgia will be paid, and the Mississippi stock will be absorbed by the sale of the public lands in the Mississippi Territory, which will give an additional revenue from the public lands for the year 1820, and for subsequent years, of - 1,500,000 00

Making the revenue for the year 1820 amount to - $24,250,000 00
Which may be estimated as the permanent annual revenue after that period.

DUTY ON STILLs.

[Communicated to the House, January 13, 1817.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 13, 1817.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 9th of March, 1816, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury "to report to the next session of Congress, whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other instruments used in distillation," I have the honor to report the information obtained upon that subject by the Commissioner of the Revenue, to whom it was referred by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The result of the inquiry instituted by that officer renders it doubtful whether any change in the existing system is indispensably necessary.

Should the change suggested by the Commissioner of the Revenue be declined, the idea presented in document C, for introducing uniformity in the form and construction of stills and boilers, appears to be entitled to consideration, if the system of internal revenue should be rendered permanent. The more easily to effect that object, the form and construction of stills and boilers deemed most efficient in distillation should be designated by law, and legal provision should be made for allowing a certain discount upon the amount of the tax imposed upon all such stills and boilers, after the expiration of a certain number of years. By fixing the time sufficiently remote to allow of the expiration of existing leases and contracts, the owners of stills of a different construction would not fail to have them changed into the form designated by law. As every deviation, after that period, from the prescribed form would be excluded from the allowance granted in favor of that description of still or boiler, no change would be attempted, except when the advantages resulting from it would exceed that allowance.

In order that this regulation may not operate to the repression of enterprise and invention, the law might provide that no change in the rate of tax thus established should be made with a view to equalize the duty, upon any deviation from the prescribed form, for a certain term of years after it should be in operation.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

The Hon. HENRY CLAY,

*Speaker of the House of Reps.*TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REVENUE OFFICE, Dec. 30, 1816.

SIR: The Secretary of the Treasury having, on the 29th day of June last, referred to me a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 9th of March preceding, requiring him "to report to the next session of Congress whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other implements used in distillation," I have the honor to make thereon the following report:

Duty on Stills.

To obtain the best materials for forming an opinion on the point referred to me, a letter was, on the 14th day of July, addressed to Dr. Samuel L. Mitchill, of New York, and to Alexander Anderson, Esq., of Philadelphia, a copy of which is annexed, marked A.

On the 15th of the same month, a circular letter (marked B) was addressed to the respective collectors of the internal revenue.

Messrs. Mitchill and Anderson, having promptly undertaken to fulfil the trust confided to them, have transmitted, as the result of their inquiries, the annexed communications, marked C, D, E., and F.

Answers have likewise been received from most of the collectors, from which it is computed that there are in the United States 650 boilers of an average capacity of 102 gallons.

11,070 stills of capacities not exceeding fifty gallons.

17,080 stills of capacities between fifty and one hundred gallons.

9,160 stills of capacities between one hundred and two hundred gallons; and 570 stills of capacities exceeding two hundred gallons.

Agreeably to the information derived from these and other sources, aided by that previously in the Treasury, it appears—

That by far the greater number of stills (more, probably, than nine out of ten) are of the common old construction, which is generally very uniform.

That the shallow stills, though at present few in number, are increasing slowly.

That if the late changes and present most approved forms of construction be taken as a guide, the advantages, combining all the incidental circumstances of the shallow over the deep stills, do not seem to be generally considered as great.

That the benefit attached to stills with Whitmer's and Anderson's improvements appear to be much greater.

That the new stills in use exhibit a great variety of construction, and differ, in their productive powers, much from each other.

That the boilers, as well in their construction as their products, differ greatly from each other.

That, although the present duty on the boilers is generally considered as relatively lower than that on the stills, the former do not seem materially, if at all, to increase; that, on the contrary, the instances are frequent in which they have been abandoned for stills; a circumstance which arises, perhaps, principally from the inferior quality of the spirits made with the boilers. A contrary opinion is, however, expressed on this point, as well as others connected with boilers, by Mr. Anderson.

The inequalities in the operation of the existing duties do not, in my opinion, sensibly affect the revenue, or give to one description of vessels advantages, in their practical effects, greatly injurious to those of a different description. As, however, it satisfactorily appears that several cases exist of stills, as well as boilers of a particular form, paying at present but an inconsiderable duty compared with that generally paid, it is probable that these inequalities, however limited at present, will, unless seasonably counteracted, become the germs of much greater inequalities.

It has been suggested that this counteraction may be effected by graduating the duty, according to the size and form of each still or boiler, on a principle resulting from a combination of their form and size.

It was, in a great measure, with the view of ascertaining the practicability of this suggestion, that the inquiry submitted to Messrs. Mitchill and Anderson was instituted. Their answers, and particularly the experiments of Mr. Anderson, will show the light they have been enabled to shed upon this point.

Although it does not appear, either from their researches or from a general consideration of the subject, that the adoption of such a principle is absolutely impracticable, the complexity attendant on any plan that has been devised for its application is so great as to render the result at least questionable; while, if the opinion of Mr. Anderson on the relative products of shallow and deep stills be received as correct, the necessity for adopting such a principle is greatly shaken.

Should, under the impression that shallow stills have, according to a given ratio, an advantage over deep ones, a duty be laid on their capacity up to a certain line, and a lower duty on their capacity above such line, increasing, at pleasure, the several rates of duty, it must be obvious that, as the forms of the stills now in use are extremely different, and are daily becoming more so, the inevitable effect of such a principle would be, unless equal in its operation on all possible kinds of stills, to act as a bounty, at the expense of all the rest, on vessels so constructed as least sensibly to feel the duty.

To show how difficult it is to find and to apply such a principle, it may be useful to state the recent use of a deep still, with a large hollow cylinder, open at the bottom, and rising in the centre to a considerable height, by which the surface around this centre, exposed to the direct action of the fire, is greatly enlarged. Here, then, is an instance of a deep still, the duty on which would be relatively light, possessed, perhaps, of equal if not greater productive powers than a shallow still.

If it shall be deemed unsafe to adopt a principle doubtful in theory, and attended with such difficulties in its application, and it shall, nevertheless, be considered expedient to attempt a further equalization of the existing duties, the following is suggested as the most equitable and effectual plan.

It has been stated that by far the greater number of stills (more, probably, than nine out of ten) are of an uniform construction. As it is on considerations drawn from the productive powers of these that the present duties were imposed, all that is requisite to insure an equal and impartial operation of the duties, as well on existing stills of a different construction as on such as may be hereafter constructed; is to impose duties on these two classes, agreeably to their productive powers, proportionate to those paid on stills of the common kind. To effect this object, it is respectfully proposed that the present duties on stills be the minimum duties imposed, to be exacted in all cases not specially provided for; and that it be specially provided that, in the case of stills which deviate from the common construction, a particular survey be made of each still at the time it shall be first used, and that the duty on its capacity be specifically fixed, on its computed productive powers, agreeably to the award on such survey; that this survey and award be made by the collector, with such professional skill as he may call to his assistance; but that in case the award be not satisfactory to the owner of the still, a reference be authorized to such person as may be named by the collector and such person as may be named by the owner of the still, with power, in case of their disagreement, to name an umpire; that the expense, if there be no appeal from the original survey, be defrayed by the United States; and if there be an appeal, by the owner of the still; and that the award thus given shall continue to regulate the duties payable until the still shall undergo a change in its form or size, when a like survey shall be repeated.

In the case of boilers, it would seem best to submit them all to a special survey, adhering to the present as the minimum rates of duty.

An essential feature of this plan is, in no instance, to receive on any still or boiler a lower rate of duty than that now imposed; for should the system admit, according to circumstances, of a diminution as well as augmentation of duty from the prescribed standard, it would be difficult to assign any limits to the consequent defalcation of revenue.

The objection to this plan, on the ground of expense, cannot be great, as the anomalous cases to which it would apply would not, probably, in the first year amount to one thousand, while in subsequent years they would be comparatively few. I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant.

SAMUEL H. SMITH,
Commissioner of the Revenue.

HON. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
REVENUE OFFICE, July 14, 1816.

SIR: A resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 9th of March, 1816, requires "that the Secretary of the Treasury report to the next session of Congress whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other implements used in distillation."

The Secretary of the Treasury having referred this subject to me, I have the honor of requesting from you, towards its elucidation, such information as it may be in your power to communicate.

From the general attention which you are known to have paid to chemistry and the arts, you will, it is supposed, possess the means of adding to the information to be derived from foreign sources the more valuable lights of your own experience in this country, by which such a practical criterion may be attained as we may safely adopt.

I enclose a copy of the existing act of Congress, which shows the manner in which the duty on stills and boilers is now laid.

The following remarks may enable you, with the greater precision, to give the requisite information.

1. The complete equalization sought can, it is believed, be no otherwise effected than by imposing the duty in such way as in effect to lay an equal burden on the same quantity of spirits of like quality, whether made in stills, boilers, or other vessels used or that may be used for distillation.

2. The duty must be laid on the still or boiler, agreeably to a principle that can be applied at the time of granting the license, and, consequently, before the employment of the still or boiler.

In several foreign countries the duty is understood to be on the capacity of the mash-tubs, or the quantity of wash; but the circumstances of this country and the habits of our citizens forbid a resort to this expedient.

3. It is indispensable that the principle adopted shall apply to all existing and probable cases arising from new forms of distillatory vessels that may be introduced into use, and that it should be so simple as to be easy of application.

Two sources of inequality are alleged to exist under the present system: one arising from the relative inequality of the duty on boilers compared with that on stills, and the other from the relative inequality of the duty on stills.

In regard to the first class of cases, the boilers are said to be of such various construction that the present duty is in some cases much greater than in others, and that this is so to such a degree, as to give the most improved boilers a great advantage over other boilers, and a much greater over stills. Although there is strong reason to believe that there is much exaggeration in the popular opinion on this head, it is worthy of consideration whether the capacity of the vessels that convey the steam would not constitute a better principle for the imposition of the duty than the capacity of the vessels in which it is generated.

In regard to the second class of cases, it is alleged, and certainly with some truth, that great advantages are gained by some stills, from their peculiar size and form, over others. This allegation has been answered by observing that this is, and perhaps, under any modification of the duty, must continue to be the case, as it flows from the progressive improvements in the arts, and is, in fact, intimately connected with their advancement; the advantage incident to every new improvement operating as a bounty. But it is replied, that the different habits of the country do not admit of the general adoption of the most improved implements, and that, considering the vast number of stills already in use, any duty which operates as a bounty on those of a new construction must be oppressive to the owners of those now in use.

It has been suggested that the duty might, in these cases, be equitably modified by imposing a particular rate of duty on the capacity in gallons to a certain height from the bottom of the still, and different rates of duty on the capacity beyond this point, diminishing the rate with the ascending points, and augmenting the number of these points as circumstances should require. To determine the correctness of this principle, it would appear necessary to ascertain whether the aggregate capacity of the still, accordingly as it should be large or small, would not exhibit anomalous results; and whether its general form, or that of its parts, would not also have a like effect, and in such a degree as to destroy the equal operation of the principle. It is especially desirable that the practicability of this expedient should be effectually investigated.

Should you succeed in fixing any new principle, agreeably to which the duty might be laid, it will still remain to state with precision the means by which it will be best and easiest carried into effect without the use of philosophical instruments, or the possession of other than the elementary principles of mathematics.

As the solution of these inquiries, and the establishment of a general basis for the equitable imposition of this duty, cannot probably be effected without actual experiment and much minute observation, some expense will necessarily be incurred, which will be cheerfully defrayed provided it shall not exceed two hundred dollars. I am not insensible of the awkwardness of any such limitation in a case where a favor is requested; but its correspondence with the invariable usage of the Treasury will, I hope, constitute a due apology for it.

You will much oblige me by an early answer, apprising me whether it will be convenient to you to attend to this business, on which it is desirable that a report should be made to this department by the 1st of October next.

I am, &c.,

S. H. SMITH,

Commissioner of the Revenue.

SIR: A resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 9th of March, 1816, requires "that the Secretary of the Treasury report to the next session of Congress whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other implements used in distillation."

The Secretary of the Treasury having referred this subject to me, I request that you will communicate to me, previous to the 1st of October next, such information as will, in your opinion, contribute to the formation of a correct judgment. I wish particularly to ascertain—

1. The number of boilers in your district, and their average capacity.

2. The number of stills, and their average capacity, formed into four classes: 1st. Those under fifty gallons; 2d. Those between fifty and one hundred gallons; 3d. Those between one hundred and two hundred gallons; and 4th. Those above two hundred gallons.

3. A general description of the prevalent construction of the stills and boilers.

4. A specification, with as much precision as may be, of the various products of each kind, so as to show the degree of inequality of the present duty, distinguishing particularly between the stills and boilers, and between the shallow and deep stills; and combining with these statements a view also of the relative expense, arising either from the original cost or the accruing charges incident to each kind, and of the quality of the spirits made.

It is not contemplated that these materials should be the result of actual enumeration or measurement, but that they should merely be such as not materially to deviate from the truth.

To this information you will be pleased to add your opinion of the most eligible mode of imposing the duty. I am, respectfully,

S. H. SMITH,

Commissioner of the Revenue.

C.

Answer of Dr. Samuel L. Mitchill to the Commissioner of the Revenue.

New York, Sept. 20, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor of laying before you such reflections as have occurred to me upon the resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 9th March, 1816, requiring a report to be made whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to equalize the duty on the capacity of stills, boilers, and other implements used in distillation.

Considering the difficulties which, in our free country, oppose themselves to the strict examination of distilleries, when in operation, by revenue officers, and contemplating the numberless tricks by which fair dealing is evaded, I should almost be inclined to advise a discontinuance of the duty. Whatever may be said against the immorality arising from the intemperance and excessive use of distilled spirits, it must be owned that the false swearing and deception growing out of a system of false excise add greatly to its amount.

But the policy of laying a duty on distilled spirits not being referred to my consideration, I pass it by. The measure having been adopted, and being now actually in force, it is my business to aid you, in the best way I can, to render it efficacious.

In executing the undertaking, I have availed myself of all the information within my reach; such as experiments on distillation by various sorts of apparatus; the different modes of working; the several materials employed; the information derived from skilful and practical men; and the expedients heretofore used to obtain from each distillery a revenue proportioned to the amount and condition of the spirits distilled; and to render my judgment as correct as possible, in an affair of so much intricacy, I have made trials of my own, as far as I deemed them necessary within the term allotted me.

Duty on Stills.

The present inquiry I consider as limited to an excise on the production of spirits, and not on their consumption. I suppose, also, that I am expected to treat it strictly as a matter of revenue. Other considerations, naturally growing out of the subject, as a great article of domestic economy, will, therefore, be spared.

The main object of a duty upon ardent spirits, in the process of preparation, is to derive a revenue for the Treasury from the citizens who pay money to the Government for licenses to carry it on.

There would be little or no fiscal difficulty in the case if the operators would consent to the only mode that exists of ascertaining the matter with precision; that is, by allowing the revenue officer to determine the quantity and quality of the product at the distillery. But as this rule, the fair and just one for the public and the individual, is rejected, it becomes necessary to devise a substitute for it, or contrive some project that shall answer the purpose of ascertaining tolerably well between the parties how much the distiller shall give, and how much the sovereign receive, for the privilege of converting the raw material into alcohol.

In such a state of the question, after all that can be done in the investigation, there will probably remain grounds or pretexts for complaint. It must be remembered, however, that discontent is natural to man; and the expression of that discontent may be considered as effecting, to a considerable degree, its own cure. The paradox contains sound remark which says, "if human beings were incapable of rendering themselves miserable, they would not be happy." If the Government, therefore, in any case can be satisfied that the law it enacts is substantially right and good, the little murmuring that may exist may be contemplated as the remedy for the imagined uneasiness or pain.

The intention of the Government being thus simply to derive revenue from the process of distillation, there are several stages at which the eye of its agents may watch the operation and levy the tribute.

I shall begin by an examination of the following points in regular succession:

1. To lay the duties upon the raw material.
2. To lay it upon the process of fermentation.
3. To lay it upon the process of distillation.
4. To lay it upon the distilled product itself.

Each of these subjects will be separately considered.

It may, at first view, seem a departure from the matter referred to, to consider anything other than the capacities of stills, boilers, and other implements used in distillation. But when I reflect that revenue is the desideratum, it is believed to be an allowable digression to notice the raw material, for the purpose of examining whether the duty ought not to be laid upon it, as well as for the purpose of introducing more intelligibly the subsequent part of this report.

1st. Concerning the imposition of a duty upon the raw materials intended to be employed in distillation.

An individual may contract with the Government, or its agents, for leave to convert an assigned quantity of a crude article into as much spirit as he is capable of extracting from it. If the Government requires that he shall buy a permit for it, the citizen may be obliged, by law, to pay for the privilege in the manner and to the amount prescribed, or pay a penalty. To distil without a license is now an offence; so it would then be to extract spirit from a raw material without having paid for leave. The difficulty in the execution of such a law would principally arise from the abuse the distiller might make of his license, by distilling more than he pays for. As a preventive of this, the sanction of an oath may be required, that he will not transgress the limits of his license. This will restrain conscientious men. He may be required to enter into a bond with a penalty, subjecting him to damages and costs in case of a violation of its conditions. He should, moreover, be compelled to report, in writing, and file with the collector at the same time, the capacity, number, and situation of his stills and implements; as also the place where they are erected, the quantity of fuel they consume, and the number of hands they employ. This would serve as a collateral or auxiliary evidence. The law may provide that the collector of each district shall possess all this information, to the end that he may be enabled to form a more correct judgment, and know how to detect violations.

The distiller may be watched, and be as much exposed to detection as in the present mode. It would be a circumstance in favor of the revenue that there should be, at the collector's office, an exhibition of the quantity intended to be distilled, as well as of the apparatus to be employed in the operation. Upon this plan, a distiller would be licensed to work upon an acknowledged and specified quantity of materials. On these the Government would impose a corresponding sum. Against transgressions and infractions the same precaution might be employed as at present. It might be expected that some persons of selfish and avaricious dispositions, and of immoral habits, would exceed the bounds of their permits. With the ready means of detection, it may be presumed that these occurrences would not be very numerous, and, consequently, the defalcations not very serious. De minimis non curat lex, say the lawyers; and if the Treasury derives a good revenue from the tax on preparing ardent spirits, I would not be over anxious, in a country like our own, about trifling variations. They might be not seen or not noticed.

Duty on Stills.

On this view of the subject, the law might require that each distiller should state the quantity and kind of the materials he means to employ for the purpose of extracting spirit, and that he should purchase a license from the revenue officer accordingly. The mode of grinding, fermenting, working, and preparing the materials might be left afterwards to his own skill and discretion. If, by extraordinary success in his operations, he should procure much spirit, pro rata, from his ingredients, let him, at least for the present, enjoy the benefit of his discoveries. An improved plan of arranging the fiscal as well as the economical details might be reasonably expected to arise, in due time, from careful and reiterated sets of experiments. The Government, by making discreet and reasonable inquiry, would acquire and enjoy the ultimate advantage of them.

A mode of laying such a duty may be conceived thus:

A. Upon domestic materials.

(a) Grain.—Rye, — cents the bushel of — pounds. Maize, — cents the bushel of — pounds. Rice, barley, or any other grain, — cents the bushel of — pounds.

(b) Fruit, or its products.—Pomace or cider, — cents the gallon. Mash of peaches, — cents the gallon. Blackberries, gooseberries, or other fruits, — cents the gallon of bruised pulp.

(c) Roots, and their parts.—Potatoes, — cents the bushel. Other roots, — cents the bushel.

(d) Saccharine juices, or sweets.—Domestic molasses, or sugar cane, grown within the United States, — cents the gallon. Syrup or juice of the maple, — cents the gallon. Juice of green maize, or other vegetables, — cents the gallon.

B. Upon foreign materials.

An increased rate of duty, whenever they come under either of the preceding heads, of thirty per cent. on the existing ratio.

The possession, by a distiller, of materials proper for distillation, other than his own crop, to be considered as prima facie evidence of an intention to distil them; but the possessor may show they were otherwise employed. The possession of a still, or distilling apparatus, to be presumptive evidence of an intention to distil, until the contrary shall be shown. The license may authorize the purchaser to distil as many bushels of grain, as many gallons of pomace or cider, as great a quantity of roots, or as much sweet or saccharine juice, as shall be therein expressed. Care might be taken to make him pay for a maximum; and he may afterwards be checked by the capacity of the still, and the duration for which it is employed.

Upon this plan, it appears to me that a certain revenue can be laid and collected. The bulk of the materials would be adverse to concealment. There would be no espionage to offend the citizen by penetrating too deeply into his private affairs.

2d. Concerning the imposition of a duty upon the process of fermentation, when intended to prepare substances for eliciting distilled spirit.

After the grain shall have been ground to meal, the fruits crushed to pomace, the roots reduced to pulp, and the saccharine substance diluted in water, they all, after the extinction of their vital principle, and when mingled with a due proportion of humidity, and likewise moved by a proper degree of caloric or anticropion, commence a train of intestine actions, called fermentation. In the course of these commotions among the particles of the fermenting materials, its original constitution is further destroyed or changed, and new products are formed. Among these is a vinous liquid, which, by the seasonable application of an increased and boiling heat, may be converted into alcohol. The vats or tubs in which the fermentation is carried on may be made the measure of the duty on the spirit the fermenting mass is estimated to contain or afford. Their capacity, like that of the stills, may be ascertained by gauging. The fermentation may thus be made to furnish a rule whereby the amount of duty shall be calculated; the batch of beer, wort, or wash, be excised; or, rather, the future spirit will be dutied in the batch.

3d. Concerning the laying a duty upon the process of distilling ardent spirit.

This is the operation whereby a vinous fluid is changed into alcohol. The liquid is readily volatilized, or turned to vapor; it has, therefore, been called a spirit, or aerial thing. Being readily inflammable, it is termed ardent spirit. As one of its remarkable effects on the human constitution, when applied to the olfactory organ, or to the inner coat of the stomach, is to produce drunkenness, it has been distinguished as intoxicating or inebriating spirit; and inasmuch as it has usually been prepared by that sort of alembic called the still, it has been known by the name of distilled spirit. This conversion takes place in consequence of new chemical affinities among the constituent parts or particles of the material or thing distilled. If it remained in the vat or tub in the ordinary temperature, the vinous would change to acetous; or, in other terms, the wine would turn to vinegar. By being exposed to a higher and quicker heat the fermentation is suddenly stopped, and a new product formed by the change of the vinous matter to spirituous, or by a conversion of wine to alcohol.

In laying the duty upon this process of conversion, the capacity of the alembic, whether still, boiler, or any other vessel, has been considered by some as affording the best rule or criterion by which the product could be judged.

I remember very well the difficulty which had arisen on this method of estimating the price of a license before the year 1802. Some of the distillers had discovered new and improved ways of working, by which they were running off greater quantities of spirit than had ever been practised. They who adopted these improvements actually procured unusual quantities of alcoholic fluid, through stills of very moderate capacities, in a surprisingly short time. This was effected chiefly by the construction of the distillatory vessels. They had broad bottoms, with an extensive surface for exposure to the fire; they had low heads, so that the vapor had but a short distance to rise. The heads were capacious, enabling the condensation to be performed there, and within them. Such condensation altered the capacity of the spirit to contain caloric. While in the vaporous state, the spirit contained a large proportion of caloric; on condensing to liquid, its capacity for caloric was so much diminished, that a great deal was left for absorption by the surrounding bodies. To receive this disengaged and abundant caloric, the distiller had aptly contrived to surround the head of his still by water, or by the fermenting liquid of the vat. If water was employed, it became heated, by this admirable piece of economy, to a degree fit to answer the purpose of macerating and fermenting the raw material in the tubs or vats. If the wort, beer, or fermented mass, was made to encircle or surround the head of the still, that wort, beer, or fermented material itself became heated, and prepared the better to be received into the body of the still. While condensation of vapor is going on within the head, the spirit so brought to a liquid state on its inner surface was received, as it trickled down, into a sort of canal, trough, or gutter, near the neck of the still, and carried through the worm to the extremity of the tube, to be drawn off. By this contrivance, the liquid spirit condensed in the head was collected within the neck, and, instead of falling back into the body of the still, to be elevated by force of fire anew, was fairly carried off, very economically, at once.

For certain facts and proceedings relative to distillation, I refer to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means for 1802, as it is recorded substantially in the sixth volume of the Medical Repository, page 208, and to the eighth volume of the same work, pages 148 to 164, for a review of Krafft's American Distiller. In the former of these, the quantity actually distilled is considered the only sure test; and, in the latter, it is shown how a still of small capacity may produce a great quantity of spirit.

The advantages derived from the new mode of constructing stills rendered the duty then in force upon their capacities so unequal and inefficient, that an immediate remedy was demanded. Some progress had been made in devising a legislative expedient by the proper authorities, when it was determined by Congress that the internal taxes should be repealed. That act, the moment it took place, superseded all further attempts to raise money for the Treasury by a duty on distillation. The subject was dismissed from the investigation of our political economists. But the invention of distillers was as active and busy as ever. Persevering in their efforts, they went on, adding one improvement to another, until they have facilitated and cheapened the process of distillation, and the art of procuring ardent spirit from the crude material, almost as much as is practicable.

At length, after so many amendments in the distilling apparatus, and so many alterations in the distilling process, the Government once more came forward and demanded of the distillers payment for the privilege of converting vinous liquor into alcohol.

The difficulties in the way of laying the duties in an equitable manner would be very much diminished if all the stills and apparatus for distillation were constructed upon one and an uniform plan, and all of them worked, as then they would be, by a similar and corresponding process.

These inequalities may be referred to four principal heads:

1. Of stills constructed upon the old plan.
2. Of stills constructed not exactly upon the old plan, and yet not upon the best modern improvement.
3. Boilers, or a distilling apparatus worked by aid of steam, or boiling vapor.
4. Of other modern contrivances, such as log stills, rectifying vats, and some other utensils, not belonging strictly to either of the former descriptions.

I consider some of these as inferior modes of distillation. Consequently, a high duty laid upon the capacity of such, according to the rates of the most improved still, would bear heavily and unequally. It must check the progress of distillation, by forcing a number of the distilleries to stop; for the man who used the most improved still, and performed three times as much work, paid no more duty than his neighbor who distilled only a third upon the same tax. The enemy of distilled spirits has no cause for exultation on this event. The deficiency of domestic liquors was made up by importations from foreign places. Rum has been brought from the West Indies to supply the want of whiskey. A policy in the British colonies favorable to distilling for exportation furnished the spirit drinkers among ourselves with as much as they desired.

Congress, if I rightly understand their statute on the subject, make the capacity of the still the rule whereby the duty is laid and collected.

The acknowledged inequality of this rule is not very easy to correct. There are stills constructed in the old way, with contracted bottoms, enlarged bellies, long necks, and high small heads. Some of these have been erected at great expense; the proprietors do not incline to pull them down and erect modern stills in their stead; but they persevere in working them under all the comparative disadvantages. In many instances these distilleries, with their fixtures and apparatus, are let or leased to other persons. It cannot be expected that a short lessee or temporary tenant will cause expensive alterations to be made, which the landlord or proprietor himself would not authorize or undertake. The person who occupies such a distillery works the existing apparatus in the best way he can; but if he pays the duty on the capacity at the rate required for improved and modern stills, he pays proportionably, perhaps, a double duty and more.

It has been said this inconvenience is chargeable to the ignorance and obstinacy of the owner, or his lessee, who might change the form of their stills, and put themselves on a footing with their neighbors. So they might, and of right they ought to do so.

It is not wholly conformable to our usages to direct individuals how to conduct their private concerns; yet, in the materials, and sometimes in the manner and place of constructing houses; in the execution and registry of deeds, mortgages, and wills; in the navigation of ships; in the importation of merchandise, and many other cases, the Legislature beneficially interferes and directs. So, in the present instance, the Government might, upon considerations of the soundest policy, refuse altogether to grant licenses to those old-fashioned stills. It might be declared that licenses should be granted to stills on Anderson's, Krafft's, or Parsons's construction, or any preferable one which the Treasury should choose. This would stop all the others, and compel the present complaining owners and possessors to model them anew, conformably to the provisions of law.

Such a regulation might seem to border rather more upon the imperative than could be wished. In reality I believe it would be found far less inconvenient than at first sight it appears. Already the old stills are a sort of depreciated property; in the progress of improvement their value must suffer a further diminution. A distiller, whether he owns the establishment he works, or hires it of his neighbor, will reasonably wish to pursue his business in the approved and modern way. A distillery upon the improved plan is worth more money to the proprietor, even if he works it himself; it will bring more rent if he lets it to another; therefore, the alteration necessary to bring the old-fashioned still to the modern standard of excellence, though expensive in the first instance, will, in the end, be substantially better both for the owner and occupant; the improvement will enable him to do more business; his work will be performed in an easier and better manner. The practical result from the whole is, that the new fixtures and apparatus being made to conform to the new principles of distillation, the inequality arising from the unequal quantities distilled in different distilleries, under the same duties, will be wholly done away, or reduced to a trifling variation.

Such a regulation of stills I conceive to be a Constitutional power. My experiments and observations convince me it is necessary to render them as uniform as possible, that the duty may also be equalized as nearly as practicable. There is no expedient within my knowledge that promises so fair and equal a result; it ought to be required of all distilleries to comply with the rule, and all will then be upon equal terms. But while a marked difference exists in the construction and working of the distilling apparatus, I question very much whether any rule can be found that will apply to them all; at least I must own that the experiments whence such a regulation can be deduced are not within the circle of my knowledge.

In this case the alleged inconvenience to the citizen will be pronounced by the liberal and patriotic statesman as one to which he ought to submit for the public good. It is obligatory on him to comply, and cheerfully too, with so reasonable a requisition. No man is obliged to distil ardent spirit; they who embark in the business are bound by feelings of respect to the Government, and of obedience to its wise and wholesome laws, to comply with a rule so practicable and so useful.

Upon a moral contemplation of this subject the argument is conclusive in favor of the project now offered; the baneful effects of numerous small stills all over the country are universally acknowledged; their number ought to be lessened. The business would be rendered more easy for the collectors of the revenue, if licenses should be refused, peremptorily, to all stills of a smaller capacity than say thirty gallons. I should recommend such a restriction, both as salutary in its tendency, and beneficial to the revenue. The Government, which concedes a great deal to the accommodation of the citizen, may expect in return some condescension, some conciliation on the part of the citizen.

If our people, in the exercise of their inventive powers, choose to modify their apparatus a thousand different ways, I see no ground of substantial justice or of sound policy that should induce the Legislature to follow them through all their meandering and devious courses. If, nevertheless, Congress should not judge it safe to proceed in this way, nor feel an inclination to reform, by this radical measure, the actual irregularities, it is much to be feared no method can be adopted that will go so far to equalize the duty on the process for forming alcohol.

Hitherto I have indulged my thoughts conformably to the instructions received from the Commissioner of the Revenue, to devise some new method of imposing the duty, in such way as will lay an equal burden on the materials and vessels used in distillation.

On summing up the evidence upon this part of the inquiry, the following conclusions rationally present themselves:

First, the duty on the raw material may certainly be made as uniform as anything that is the subject of legislation. A distiller pays for the quantity he means to work up, and for no more; the main difficulty will be to prevent his working up more than he pays for; yet a due degree of vigilance will methodize this matter tolerably well.

Second, the same remark may be applied to the fermenting vat. The capacity of this reservoir or vessel, ascertained by the gauger, will afford a rule by which the duty may be evenly and regularly estimated. But magnitude will not disclose the frequency of the charges, nor will it show how often the industry and skill of the distiller shall repeat his fermenting batches. The presumption arising from a knowledge of the quantity of materials that may be fermented at a time, and an acquaintance with the term for which a license is taken out, with some other particulars and details, will enable a tolerably correct opinion to be formed of the quantity of grain, fruits, roots, or juices intended to be distilled; the tub or vat may be rated accordingly.

The rule thus, with all its imperfections, will be found full as good as that which refers to the capacity of the still, without knowing how frequently it is charged and discharged.

For the reason stated in the Commissioner's letter, I have endeavored to avoid the stationing an officer in the distillery to determine the quantity of beer or wort; but simply to use the ascertained capacity of the mashtub or fermenting vat, as a sort of index to the amount of alcoholic liquor the distiller intended to prepare. To this it is probable the habits of our citizens would oppose no serious objection. The small variance that might exist in the fermenting process of different vessels will, it is believed, make no memorable difference in the proceeds. A person experimentally conversant in these proceedings would not fail to urge the importance of causing all the fermenting vessels to be constructed according to a form which the law might prescribe, or empower the revenue department to direct.

Third, the uniformity already recommended in the construction of stills will naturally lead to an equalization of the duty upon them. When the vessels, apparatus, and utensils of one distillery shall be similar to those of another, the respective proprietors will have no cause to complain of disparity; nor will the revenue department be puzzled, as at present, for a rule by which equal justice may be measured to all.

Fourth. Concerning the imposition of a duty upon the distilled product itself.

This is introduced into this report chiefly for the sake of method; being not a part of the subject referred, it is not discussed. But if it had been proposed for my consideration, it might have been rapidly disposed of, inasmuch as other Governments furnish volumes of precedent and practice in relation to it.

I have thus considered, in such way as I supposed pertinent, the four fundamental modes of equalizing the duty; but I have by no means exhausted the subject; other modes of laying it upon the distilling process remain to be mentioned.

Should Congress not venture to regulate, by law, the construction of stills, nor to refuse licenses to those below a certain and defined capacity, another expedient may be tried. This consists in arranging all distillatory vessels under three heads:

1. Stills, properly so called.
2. Boilers, where steam is an auxiliary.
3. New improvements on both, and preferred to both; of which preference the erection should be considered as evidence.

I shall examine them separately.

1. There is no need of defining what particular apparatus, or connexion of vessels and implements, constitute a still. I take it for granted the meaning is perfectly understood by those who superintend the revenue, as well as by those who prepare alcohol. It might be insisted that all the vessels coming under the character of stills, as I am now considering them, should be conformed to a special regulation. To render it as little inconvenient as possible, the regulation might go into effect at an assigned future day, say six or twelve months after the passing of the act; until then the present rate of duty might be continued; as at present, stills ought to be subjected to the lowest rate of duty. As far as experiments warrant a conclusion, they will hereafter be continued at the most moderate tax of the three grades. It might be easy for Congress to favor those persons who promptly complied with the new and improved system, by exempting such as were willing and obedient from the payment of the duty for three or six months, as an indemnity, encouragement, or reward.

I present this to your judgment as a cardinal point, under a firm persuasion that, with prudent management, the reform may be wrought in a tranquillizing manner, without oppressing, or even alarming the citizen. The proposed amendment in the system will be gradually introduced, and in the end be as favorable to the interest and comfort of the distiller as to the uniformity of laying the duty, and the ease of collecting it.

2. Boilers, as the act expresses it, are the utensils employed for the purpose of generating steam in those distilleries where wooden or other vessels are used instead of metal stills, and the action of steam is substituted for the immediate application of fire to the materials from which spirituous liquors are distilled. I have not, as yet, been satisfied, during the short and limited time allowed by the authority under which I act, that there can be any practical distinction established between the several sorts of boilers; all of them are utensils or instruments of a similar nature; they depend upon the same principle; they are so analogous in their nature and construction that they ought to form a distinct and separate class of cases. I therefore recommend that measures be taken to cause boilers to be constructed according to a prescribed rule, model, or form. They will thus be clearly discriminated from stills, and be arranged entirely by themselves. This may be done under the same provisions, mutatis mutandis, as for stills. It will produce uniformity, or an approximation to it, near enough for the purposes of revenue; it being understood what a boiler is, as contradistinguished from a still, and all the implements of that kind classed together, they may all be dutied upon a principle deduced therefrom, and pervading the whole class. The existing statute appears to me to be correct in deciding that boilers should pay a higher duty than stills. As far as my mind is guided by experimental assays, the present rate of a double duty is as low as the distiller ought to pay, or the Government to receive.

3. But I would place in a third class all the vessels and implements for distillation varying from stills and boilers at the time of passing the law, and comprehending all improvements in distillation after the act went into operation. To this class of cases an additional amount or third rate of duty ought to attach. This augmented sum may be reasonably demanded, under a presumption that the newest method adopted is preferable to any other in use, or the distiller would not employ it. To erect and work such apparatus would admit a construction that it possesses certain advantages. A greater quantity of spirit prepared by each gallon of such vessel's capacity probably subjects that vessel to an increased tax. The proposal now offered will, it is hoped, serve as a reply to that paragraph of the Commissioner's letter relating to "probable cases arising from new forms of distilling vessels that may be introduced into use." The regulations of law may then follow close by on the heels of discoveries, if they do not travel pari passu with them.

Thus I have endeavored to fulfil the promise I made you, by submitting to your discernment my views of a radical cure for the disorder; and, if that should be declined, of a palliative course of treatment. Some other ideas press forward with earnestness, and importune me to reduce them to writing. I gratify them, and honor them by an incorporation into this report. Read on, and you will discover them.

I have attended to the Commissioner's suggestions of proportioning the duty, in an inverse ratio, to the height the spirit has to rise from the bottom of the still. It does not appear, from experiments, that anything could be gained by that expedient; for it would be easy to construct stills exceedingly low, and to take off the spirit a few feet from the bottom. The breadth and extent of the evaporating surface might be substituted for height in estimating the amount of liquor distilled. Besides, the dissimilar forms of the still, the different area of surface receiving caloric and exhaling vapor, the disproportionate skill and convenience for applying the fire, and several other incidents to the process, all concur to produce varying results, which are not sufficiently digested to constitute the basis of any fiscal arrangement that aims at correctness.

The means of surmounting these anomalies are comprehended in the modes of reform proposed in the preceding part of this report, of the distilling apparatus itself. Until something of this kind shall be done, I do not perceive how there can be either a uniform or equal method of laying the duty. But that uniformity being once established in the construction of stills, will lead, of course, to uniformity in the mode of working them, and thereby an equalization of the product be so far estimated, that, taking the several parts of the operation together, a rule may be discovered for fixing the duty in a fair and equal way upon their evaporating surfaces.

It is also suggested by the Commissioner of the Revenue, that possibly the capacity of the vessels conveying the steam might constitute a better principle for the imposition of the duty than the capacity of the vessels in which it is generated. I have attended to this point as minutely as I could; and have not been able to derive from it any practical rule. The main difficulty arises from the velocity of steam, like that of any other fluid in a small pipe, enabling it to transmit an equal or even a greater quantity than, under a slow movement, will be conveyed by a larger one. The diameter thus affording no safe criterion, any duty predicated upon it would, as far as my observation and judgment go, be but a mere estimate, and a very rough one too, of the duty that a boiler ought to pay.

The intricacy of tracing the application of steam to a measure of capacity of any kind is increased by the constant progress of invention and discovery. The talent of our citizens is incessantly occupied in devising novel and improved methods of doing business. One of the later contrivances, and a most ingenious one too, is to carry the alcoholic vapor of the still direct into a wooden vessel of clean water. The steam of the spirit soon raises the water to the boiling point. It then distils over into another vessel containing water, which, being heated in like manner by the condensed steam, passes over to a succeeding one. This operation is carried on through a series of vessels, which perform the work of distillation and rectification at once. And, in the midst of all these operations, conducted by means of capacious and successive boilers, the duty is construed to attach the body of the still, or there is a dispute, or perhaps a lawsuit, with the collector about it.

Experiments are likewise making to distil spirits in an apparatus exhausted of atmospheric air. By performing the operation in vacuo, it is presumed much fuel will be saved, on account of the easier rise of vapor. The authors of this project are very sanguine in their expectation of a highly advantageous result. It is within my knowledge that attempts are making to quicken and economize the evaporating or distilling progress by the removal of atmospheric pressure. The continuance of experiments will, in time, show their bearing and importance.

The way of laying the duty upon the steam tube, when traced to its source, resolves itself into a duty on the fireplace, or rather into a duty upon the fuel consumed in the fireplace of a distillery.

I shall offer a few remarks upon the project of laying the duties on the fuel employed in distilling spirits before I conclude my task.

The capacity of the fireplace has been proposed as the measure of the duty. To me the fuel actually consumed in a distillery seems preferable. The quantity of fuel burned per month or per year in a distillery can be ascertained exactly. Each cord of wood, or an equivalent in coal, may be estimated to produce a corresponding quantity of spirit. There may be small variations, according as maple, birch, beech, oak, hickory, pine, or any other wood is employed. The calculation might be made upon oak, as the most common in the United States. The average ratio between the fuel burned and the spirit produced can be ascertained without any serious difficulty.

Fire is the agent by means of which vinous matter is turned to alcoholic. If the quantity and strength of the agent could be measured, such measure would be precisely what we want. The caloric passing into the still, boiler, or other vessel, being ascertained, there would be a measure of the vapor or spirit elevated.

Fuel either contains the caloric, or possesses, during its inflammation, the power of extricating, of exciting, or of collecting that caloric. A discovery of the mean rate at which burning fuel produces spirit would enable a very equitable rule to be established as to the quantity of spirit distilled from the quantity of fuel consumed.

The duty might thus be laid upon the wood pile, or, if coal was employed, upon the coal yard. The object is to gather money into the Treasury, for the privilege of burning fuel to distil spirits. The quantity of fuel could be measured, without prying into the secrets of private transactions. The bulk of the articles would prevent much concealment and fraud. The amount would be altogether an out-of-door business. The permit may specify leave to distil as much spirit as the number of loads or cords therein mentioned could produce, or license to consume the prescribed quantity of fuel for the purpose of distilling ardent spirits.

I have thus reviewed the subject, as it relates to the levying the contribution upon the raw material, upon the fermentation, upon the distillation, and upon the spirituous product. I have considered the consequences of classing the distillatory apparatus into stills, boilers, and improvements, and of dutying them accordingly. I have discussed the altitude of the still, the capacity of the steam tube, and the consumption of fuel in the fireplace. But if, after all that has been proposed, it should seem difficult to decide upon any of them, another resort, the simplest and perhaps the best of the whole, is left to the financial calculator.

This is merely to collect from each and every distillery, or individual body of distilling apparatus, a stipulated sum, without regard to the magnitude or extent of the works. This sum ought to be a minimum, such as the smallest permitted might pay.

There is a striking analogy between the licenses to retail spirituous liquors and on licenses to distil them. The tax on production is the correlative to that on consumption. In the former case, no question is asked whether the retailer has a good run of custom or not; and in the latter, why should the Government agitate itself and torment the distiller to find out whether he is successful in his business or otherwise? Let the Treasury take a reasonable sum from each and be satisfied.

The suppression of distillers at home, by an undue and exorbitant duty, is a very dubious policy. The discontinuance of business by many of them is followed by an increased importation of rum, brandy, and other distilled spirits from abroad. The Treasury loses the duty of excise on the distillation, but it gains by the impost on entry. Yet the people drink the spirit. I therefore suppose the fiscal and moral accounts are balanced.

In this posture of affairs I have been induced to submit whether, under existing circumstances, the sum of (twenty or more) dollars be laid upon each distilling apparatus worked within the United States, without any calculation of quantity, quality, capacity, or anything else.

A review of the progress of improvement in this business will show that, between the years 1790 and 1798, it was discovered, by a most ingenious citizen of Pennsylvania, how steam might be applied to heat, and even to evaporate liquors; how the fluid to be distilled might be employed to condense the vapor of the spirit; how the project of a perpetual still was conceived; and how the removal of atmospheric pressure by the air-pump had been thought of. And since that time Brown and West's patent, in 1803, for distilling in tubs; that of Bernard in 1811, and of Gamble in 1812, for something in the nature of — improvements on the same process; and lastly, Gillespie's mode of distilling spirits by means of reservoirs for holding the liquids, cut out of the solid wood of large trees felled, squared, and suitably excavated for the application of fire and steam; all evince the unparalleled assiduity and indomitable perseverance with which the economy of distillation has been pursued. The ingenuity of our citizens, in this respect, deserves the warmest encomium.

But I have one other remark to offer in favor of a moderate duty on alcoholic spirit. Man is not a mere water-drinking animal; or if he is so, it is only in the states of society where ignorance or servitude prevails. Cultivation and freedom teach him the advantage of sustaining the strength of the laboring citizen by mingling some stimulant or invigorating ingredient with his draught. Wine is too dear for general use. Malt liquors are not universally congenial to the palate and stomach. Vegetable infusions, as of saffron and spruce, have but a limited demand. Cider too often offends the bowels and the kidneys by its sourness.

Our country abounds in corn and the other materials whence spirit can be drawn. A great deal more is raised than is necessary to support its inhabitants with food. There seems to be a strong plea for converting into drink that part of the grain which the people do not intend to eat. If they who enjoy liberty will or must have some comfortable potation, I am satisfied that whiskey is the best. The harm to be dreaded arises, not from taking it within the bounds of health and moderation, but from swallowing too much. Against all excesses and evils of this kind, I scarcely suppose it necessary for me to bid an intelligent and virtuous people—beware!

The whole of which is respectfully submitted,

SAMUEL L. MITCHILL.

PHILADELPHIA, July 27, 1816.

DEAR SIR: Your request, that I will give you my opinion on the best mode of laying an equal duty on spirituous liquors made in the United States, also keeping in view a simple plan of collection, shall be complied with as far as my talents will reach.

The different plans resorted to in Europe are, a duty on the capacity of the still, including the head; a duty on the liquor distilled, of a certain standard strength; and a duty on the wash before it is distilled. The tax on the still and head I believe to be the only way in which a fair duty can be collected on the distilleries in America: it is more equal, easier of collection, and less liable to fraud, with less irritation. I think the duty, at present, should not exceed one dollar per gallon on the capacity of the still and head, without including the condensing part, which, if taken in, would operate very unequal, as those which have little water require larger condensing power; those which have plenty of water, but little room for condensation; it therefore could not operate equally; also, the condensing part would be immediately so reduced, that Government would get but little by it, and cause much irritation. Where the duty is laid on the still and head, the tax must be paid; there is no intricacy, and little trouble in collection. The duty on spirits of a standard strength, at first view, looks well; but wherever it is put in practice, such a scene of fraud, false swearing, and villany takes place, as can scarcely be believed; and it would be impossible to collect the tax, even if you were to place one officer to every two distilleries in the United States; and even then you would not get the whole. This mode would be so expensive and troublesome, and attended with such difficulties, as to render it, in this country, almost impossible. When the distilleries are very large and few in number, the difficulties would not be so great; and then you would not get more than three-fourths of the liquor made from many, while others would give the whole.

A tax on the wash, ascertained by gauging, is quite as bad, and deception as easily practised. It is also very unequal; molasses wash contains about twelve per cent., cider ten, peach twelve, and grain wash three to five. To the eastward they work the wash very thin, say three per cent.; in Lancaster county, and westward, four to five per cent. The difficulties appear to me insurmountable in either of the last-mentioned cases, and would destroy the distilling business almost certainly. This, I should suppose, the Government would not like to do, but rather foster it in a proper manner.

Let us now examine how the duty on the stills will bear to each other, viz: the common still, the flat still, the boiler and wooden still, and the still where the wash is used instead of water to condense the steam raised by distillation.

1. The common still. One wash still of one hundred and twenty gallons, with its attendant still of sixty gallons for rectifying, will pay three hundred and sixty dollars (present duty) in one year. This wash still will be run into common four times in twenty-four hours, charged with ninety gallons of wash each time, (there must be room for the wash to boil up, and not run over in the condensing part,) which, on an average, when the wash is four per cent., will produce fourteen gallons of whiskey in twenty-four hours, fifteen per cent. below proof by Dicas. Deduct for casualties, such as the stills getting out of order, want of a supply of grain, (which often happens,) say thirty days, makes 3,370 gallons in one year, which is nine cents per gallon; this still thirty-two inches, bottom forty widest part, thirty inches deep, with a head.

2. The flat still. Still sixty inches bottom, ten inches deep, charge ninety gallons wash, same fire and attendance as the common still, will gain about one distillation in fifteen, and not more. It has been for some time received as a fact, that an extended surface yields a more copious evaporation, independent of the quantity of liquor; this may be true in part; experience does not verify it, but to a small extent. The boilers of the steam engines are, perhaps, the best proof of this. Great has been the ingenuity expended on this subject; the difference as yet is but small; the quantity of fuel and water being the same, the shape of the boiler is of no great importance; the proper construction of the fireplace is more to be attended to, that the wood may be consumed in the best manner. Count Rumford has, I think, led the public astray somewhat by small experiments. The common still and flat still may be run ten or twelve times in twenty-four hours, but then you put in but seventy gallons of cider or molasses wash, and increase the fire much; grain wash would not bear the operation; it would burn and destroy the liquor; and, indeed, with either there is nothing gained.

Let us now examine the steam boiler and still attached to it. Much more has been said on this subject than is true; the distillation is not more rapid than the other. The duty being laid on the boiler was, I think, a great mistake. The stills are certainly the proper vessels to lay the duty on. A boiler of 100 gallons may be made to work two stills of three hundred and fifty gallons, each with one still of 100 gallons for rectifying; the steam is let into the two stills alternately, and from one into the other; also from either into the rectifying still. The duty on the boiler of 100 gallons would be $432 for one year; the duty on the three stills would be $1,662. The quantity of whiskey these stills would make is about 65 to 70 gallons per day, fifteen per cent. below proof; deduct thirty days for casualties, and you have 17,500 gallons, rather more than ten cents per gallon. Perhaps eight cents would be found nearer the truth; the duty on the boiler about two cents; this is about a fair representation. The boilers in use, when they were first taxed, were large; the tax soon brought them into small compass. The stills cannot be reduced. It ought to be observed, that this mode of distillation has the advantage of not burning the liquor, and is not so liable to run foul, (that is, run over into the worm,) which, when it does, the distillation must be stopped for awhile. It should also be mentioned that it is somewhat dangerous, and it throws too much water into the wash, which renders it impossible to get the whole of the whiskey from it. The condensing part of these stills is small, not more than is usually attached to a common still of 100 gallons.

The subject requires further investigation. I will endeavor soon to make some experiments on these stills; evaporation, as yet, being but little understood.

The improved still, where the wash is made use of to condense the steam in place of water, is not to be examined. These are usually run off six times in twenty-four hours; of course one-third more of whiskey is made in twenty-four hours, and the duty reduced to six cents per gallon. This, at first view, appears unequal; but really no distiller has any cause of complaint. If those that use the common still do not see some advantage in it, they would adopt the other, which would equalize the duty at once. This improved still does not run faster than the common still, neither can you put in a larger charge, as it is as liable to run foul as the common still. The gain is wholly in making use of the wash in place of water, by which three distillations are made in place of two; the wood saved is also considerable; the difference of labor very trifling. The Government would do wrong to lay a tax on ingenuity. If every improvement in the arts would afford the United States as much money as this has done, they ought to be satisfied; besides, the principle is a wrong one. If in place of the United States giving a bounty on this, they should prohibit it by laying a heavy tax, and bring back the distillation to the old form, what would be the consequence to the revenue? There is no doubt it would be lessened very much. If a tax had been laid on it when first brought into use, it would have been fatal to it. This was proposed in Congress in the year 1811; but, it was observed, they would not consent to lay a tax on ingenuity. In the year 1795 I went to Lancaster, and built a mill and distillery near Columbia, on the banks of the Susquehanna. At this time there was, I believe, not more than thirty or forty small distilleries in Lancaster county, making from twelve to fifteen gallons per day. The current opinion then was, that stills larger than 120 gallons could not be used to profit. Having discovered the principle of conveying heat by steam in the year 1790, I showed a plan of it to Mr. Jefferson, and asked him if he thought it new, particularly its application to distillation. He said he thought it was; he had not met with it before. After satisfying myself it was correct, I put it into use in Philadelphia, and took out a patent for it in 1794. In the year 1795 I built a distillery at Columbia to work with steam, which was worked in this way three years. Meeting with an accident, from the carelessness of one of the workmen, I discontinued it. In the meantime I had discovered that the wash condensed the steam nearly as well as water, and the steam passing under it without pressure, would not make it boil; of course, if it was confined in a close wooden vessel, there would be no loss by evaporation; this was in the years 1798 and 1799. The distillery was then put up on this plan. I would here observe, if cider or molasses wash is used to condense the steam, they are made to boil, and the loss of liquor is great.

From this period you may date the great increase of distillation in Pennsylvania, and also to the East, West, and South. I believe it is correct to say that there are one-third more distilleries in the United States than would have been had not this improvement taken place. Of course, it is fair to state that the revenue on distilling has been increased one-third; I do not think it would be out of the way to say one-half. Now, had a tax been laid on it, a damp would have been felt, and the present revenue would have been much less. Many distillers wish a tax laid on it even now, that others may be deterred going into the business. The United States have received much revenue from this invention. How has the inventor been remunerated? Scarcely at all. Distillers have taken the liberty of putting them up and using them, without paying the moderate sum of fifty dollars for a still of 120 gallons. Why did you not bring an action against them? Law suits are so expensive, and my time taken up to make a living for a large family, and no money that I could spare for that purpose, prevented me, and still does so. I certainly ought to have something for it. How to come at it I do not know.

The subject of an equal tax on distillation has employed my thoughts for twenty years, and I am convinced there is no mode of coming at it in this country, where the distilleries are so extended, otherwise than laying a fair tax on the still and head. I cannot see any reasonable objection to this. It is certainly more equal than any other, easier for collection, more simple, and cannot be well used without paying for it.

The distillation in America will require great care and much attention from the Government. How far the admission of foreign liquors will interfere; whether it is more for the general interest to suffer foreigners to supply this country, or to supply ourselves; various are the opinions on the matter. I suppose there may be used in this country about twenty-four millions of gallons of spirituous liquors, about three gallons to each individual. If this is imported, the revenue will be considerable; if made at home, much less. In time of war, the revenue would almost cease. It would not then be possible to obtain a revenue from home-made liquors under two or three years. At present, these are combined; foreign liquors are admitted subject to a duty of forty cents per gallon, home-made liquors to a tax of about eight cents. This, I think, is not a sufficient difference, and, while it continues, foreign liquors will supply the market in the United States. This probably will be denied, but, if searched into, will be found to be nearly correct.

I believe France, England, Spain, or Holland do not admit foreign liquors on any terms, as they are able to supply themselves; and it may be well to consider what an enormous sum of money we should pay to foreigners for an article the United States can make themselves. The duty, in my opinion, should not be less than seventy cents per gallon on foreign liquors. This will lay a foundation for an increased revenue from domestic liquors whenever it may be wanted. If something of this kind is not done, the distilling in the United States is nearly at an end. Should things continue as they are at present for nine months, I am very certain there will be scarcely one distillery of grain on this side of the mountains. The farming interest is deeply concerned in the business, and will feel the stoppage of distilleries very sensibly. This state of the distilleries was pointed out to the Committee of Ways and Means, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of the Revenue, last February was twelve months, directly after the peace, by a committee of three distillers, who waited on them for that purpose. They were thought to be interested, and no attention was paid to what they said.

I would now inform you that more than one dollar per gallon on the capacity of the still and head will be improper and really injurious to the revenue. It has often been said that a high duty should be laid on whiskey to prevent the use of it. This is so stale an observation, and so untrue, as to be worth no notice. People will drink it; and, as it is the principal beverage in the United States, it cannot be done without. This being the case, it is better to keep the money at home than to give it to foreigners for a supply of this article.

It will be objected by the distillers of molasses that this mode of tax will operate very unfavorably to their business. A still employed in the making of rum from molasses will stand thus: one still of 1,100 gallons, with its attendant rectifier of 250, will pay about $3,200 per year; (about $13 per day;) these stills will make about 130 gallons of rum in twelve hours, which is about ten cents per gallon; and if worked the twenty-four hours, will reduce the duty to 6 cents. This, therefore, can be no hardship on them. Present state of the market of foreign and domestic liquors: imported liquors from 90 cents to $1 20 per gallon; domestic, 56 to 65 cents per gallon; rye, $1 25 per bushel; corn, $1 30 per bushel.

I have the honor to be, with much respect,
yours,
ALEX. ANDERSON.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 12, 1816.

DEAR SIR: I will now endeavor to send you the result of the experiments made, as I proposed. I am not apt in expressing my thoughts on paper. If I were with you a day or two, I could give you a much clearer view of things than by writing.

These experiments were made with a boiler containing twenty-six gallons when full; twenty gallons of water put into it, (the boiler steam tight,) six gallons being left out, that the water might have room to boil up and not run over; fire made under it with common pine wood. In forty-five minutes it began to boil; to do this consumed twenty-two pounds of wood; the water, when put into the boiler, was 63 degrees by Fahrenheit's thermometer. So, then, twenty-two pounds of wood communicated to each gallon of water 149 degrees of heat to make it boil, or 2,980 degrees to the whole, or twenty gallons. There was a contrivance to supply the waste water in the boiler, so as to keep it always to twenty gallons. The steam was then let into a wooden vessel, in which were forty gallons of water, 63 degrees. In ninety-three minutes, the forty gallons of water began to boil; consumed under the boiler forty-five pounds of wood in these ninety-three minutes. The quantity of water passed in steam from the boiler into the forty gallons and condensed was seven gallons; this ascertained by actual measurement. I put in forty gallons, and measured out 46.75 gallons, 25 or one quart being allowed for waste by evaporation, as the water was hot when measured; the heat that passed with the steam communicated to each of the forty gallons 149 degrees, or 5,960 to the whole. So that each gallon of water raised in steam conveyed with it 851 degrees of heat, and consumed rather more than six pounds of wood.

The above is the result of a number of careful experiments. Let us now see how this will bear on distillation, and how far it equalizes it.

In the first place, it plainly shows that the distillation by steam is not quicker than by the naked fire.

The boiler of twenty-six gallons passes over five gallons per hour, giving sixty gallons in twelve hours, and twelve hours to bring the wash from cold to boiling, making about four distillations in twenty-four hours, is very near the work in common distilleries, when a wash still is used of one hundred and twenty gallons, and a doubling still of forty-five gallons. As the wooden stills for a twenty-six gallon boiler would be about the same size, the quantity of liquor made would be about the same. If you enlarge the stills the proportion would be about the same, as the steam has no advantage over the naked fire. But the duty is very unequal on the twenty-six gallon boiler; the duty is $112 32 per year; on the stills of 120 and forty-five gallons, it is $378. Now, if the duty were on the wooden stills, and not on the boiler, the thing would be nearly equal; and if this should be the case, they would gain but little by enlarging the boiler, as they must also enlarge the stills. You can use a small boiler to a large still; but if you raise a large quantity of water from a large boiler or fire, and pass it through a small quantity of wash, you gain but little, as you would then raise so large a proportion of water from this rapid distillation as nearly to defeat the purpose of distillation.

If you employ the condenser, and make use of the wash to condense the steam arising in the distillation, the work done would be about one-third more. I would also observe, that they cannot use in the wooden stills more than two-thirds of the capacity of the still for wash, as room must be left for the increase of water by the condensed steam, and for the wash to boil up without running over, which, having no head, they are liable to do.

The duty being laid on the boiler is certainly wrong. If laid on the still, the steam distillation has no advantage over the others.

The experiments above detailed lay the whole of distillation before you. From them, simple as they seem, you can come at anything wanted in distillation, both evaporation and condensation. I have been particular in them, and know them to be accurate. It has taken me a fortnight to accomplish them. If your allowance had been larger, I would have pursued the principle through all the ramifications of distillation. As it is, you have the pith; and anything may be known in distillation, and also of the steam engine, which is nothing more than a large distillation, and will soon be employed in the distilleries of grain that work constantly. A small engine will serve to grind the grain, and where light steam is used, it will soon be found a great saving of fuel to use the steam when thrown out from the engine in the distillery. In such a case I do not see how you would get at any duty, as there is no boiler employed for generating steam for distillation. They are not up to this thing yet, but it will not be long before some will make the discovery.

I am, dear sir, with much respect, yours,
ALEX. ANDERSON.

SAMUEL H. SMITH, Esq.,
Commissioner of the Revenue.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 24, 1816.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter of the 21st yesterday. Being taken up so much with the steam boiler these three weeks past, and my head so filled with it, I forgot the different kinds of stills. I will now endeavor to give you all the information in my power from actual experience.

The shape of the still is of no importance in distillation, further than its form being convenient to apply the fire in the best manner. Suppose a still 72 inches in the bottom and 87 inches deep will hold about 115 gallons, charge 70 gallons, fire and attendance the same. The difference between these two stills will be 15 flat still, 14 common still; that is, the flat still will gain one distillation in 15, fire and attendance being the same. This will scarcely be credited, and I should not make the assertion if I had not actual experience as the ground of it; I know it to be true. Evaporation by fire is as the quantity of fuel applied to the liquor, and not as the surface is extended. This opinion, that a large surface being exposed assists evaporation, has arisen from observing that water exposed in broad shallow vessels to the air and sun evaporates much quicker than when exposed in narrow deep vessels. This is true; but this is altogether different from evaporation by fire. This evaporation is effected by the combined operation of the air and heat in the surrounding atmosphere; the other, solely by the heat obtained from the wood. I once thought that evaporation might be much increased by taking off the pressure of the atmosphere by the aid of the air pump. I found, from a trial of six months, that I gained nothing by it; the same quantity of fuel was used whether the air was on or off. I of course discontinued it. After trying almost every shape, I am entirely satisfied that the common still is as good for practice as any that have or will be made, and, fuel and attendance being the same, will do as much work. The subjects of evaporation and condensation have not yet come under the observation of philosophers so as to throw much light on it, being a very difficult and troublesome subject, and being but little understood. Some late experiments in Edinburgh have thrown some light on it, and will probably be the means of its being more thoroughly investigated. I allude to alcohol being frozen by the air pump; the spirit being placed in the receiver of the air pump, the air extracted carries off the heat or caloric, and the spirit is frozen in a short time. This is a mere sketch of the process. It opens a large field. In this way grain may be dried; also, gunpowder; and the moisture taken from fresh meat; and ice made, in hot climates, in any quantity. This evaporation is mentioned, to show you what quantities of heat must pass by evaporation. I do not think there is any propriety in making a difference in the tax on account of the shape of the still; the Government will get nothing by it. There may be a difference made on the different kinds of liquor distilled; the stills employed in distilling molasses, cider, and peach should pay more than those which work grain altogether; the wash from those being much stronger than that from grain. I therefore place the flat still on the same footing with the common still, and I think it clearly appears there is no difference that is worth notice. Were the duty on the still in place of the boiler, when steam is used, they would all be equal.

From the experiments sent you, anything relating to distillation may be come at with ease. Suppose a still of 120 gallons (either flat or common) with a doubling still of 60 gallons, the common rate of distillation is three and a half hours to bring it to boil, and four and a half to run off 15 gallons of low wines; discharge the still and fill it again, 90 gallons of wash in this slow distillation is the charge for 120 gallon still, will consume 100 pounds of wood to bring the 90 gallons to boil, and consume 100 pounds more wood to run off 15 gallons of low wines, which contain about 4 per cent. whiskey. This is common work. Press it further, and in place of six hours perform the work in three; this may be done by enlarging the fireplace, and you will consume not much more fuel, and do the work in half the time. This appears to be some advantage, in doing double the work in the same time. Now let us see the advantage of the rapid distillation, to say but little of the risk of burning or throwing the wash up into the worm so as to choke it, which often happens in rapid distillation: in the first place, you must reduce the charge for the still from 90 to 70 gallons wash, to leave room for the wash to boil up without running over into the worm. This is essential; if not done the fire must be lessened, which will bring it nearly to the slow distillation; also, when rapid, a large quantity of water is thrown over with the low wines, so as to weaken them very much, and require a larger still to double them; the whiskey is neither strong nor well tasted, and more and closer attendance requisite; nothing gained by it. I have also turned in my mind whether it be possible to devise any mode except a tax on the still and head; I am free to confess that I cannot. If you make spirits without any mixture of water (or alcohol, as it is now called,) a standard, and lay a duty of ten cents per gallon, and oblige the distiller to enter his stills, this appears to be a kind of check. What would be the effect when put in practice? It must be left to each distiller to return the quantity on oath; this is no security, as it is well known, and operates as a premium to a man to swear falsely. You may fence it as you will, still this would be the case; if you compare his return with the size of his still, his answer is ready; "he could not procure grain to keep his works in full operation." This frequently occurs, and would in many instances be correct, and in many not so. In short, I do not know that human ingenuity can devise a better plan for the United States than simply to lay a tax on the capacity of the still, including the head thereof. I do not think the stills employed exclusively in rectifying should be included; the liquor operated on, having paid one duty, should not pay a second.

Anything further that I can give you command freely; it will be at your service.

I am, dear sir, yours,

ALEX. ANDERSON.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 6, 1817.

PROPERTY TAKEN OR DESTROYED BY THE ENEMY.

[Communicated to the House, December 23, 1816.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, I transmit to them the proceedings of the Commissioner appointed under the "act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes." as reported by the Commissioner to the Department of War.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 21, 1816.

DECEMBER 21, 1816.

The Acting Secretary of War has the honor to submit to the President the report made by the Commissioner of Claims relative to his proceedings under the act "authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes."

GEO. GRAHAM.

Property taken or destroyed by the Enemy.

OFFICE OF CLAIMS, &c.,
Washington, Dec. 17, 1816.

The Commissioner appointed pursuant to the law entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," in obedience to a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, enclosing a resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 6th instant, in the following words: "Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to lay before this House the proceedings of the Commissioner appointed under the act passed at the last session, entitled 'An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes,' respectfully reports :

That, as soon as he received from the President a notification of his appointment, he proceeded to the execution of the initiative duties required from him, by preparing such rules and regulations relative to the mode of presenting claims and taking and authenticating evidence as appeared to him to be necessary ; which rules and regulations, having been approved by the President, were published in the form of notices, as enjoined by the said act, on the 3d and 24th of June last.

In forming these rules and regulations, the Commissioner endeavored to enter into the views of the Legislature, by giving such an interpretation to the provisions of the said act as might secure substantial justice to the sufferers intended to be relieved, and at the same time, guard against fraud and imposition. On this part of the subject he begs leave to refer to a copy of the said notices, in paper marked A.

The multifarious losses which it appears to have been the intention of the Legislature to provide for, required no little attention to separate and define. The first section of the act being confined to "volunteers or draughted militiamen, whether of cavalry, mounted riflemen, or infantry," and limited to the payment for horses only, admitted of an easy interpretation ; as did also the second section, confined to "cavalry, mounted militia, or volunteers," which the Commissioner construed also solely to apply to persons belonging to corps not in the regular service, though the word "cavalry," used in contradistinction to "mounted militia or volunteers," may, at first view, seem to indicate a different meaning, and to be intended to extend also to cavalry in the regular service. This section, too, relates solely to the loss of horses.

The third section taking a larger scope, and involving a variety of cases, he found it more difficult to satisfy himself as to its true import. The words of this section are, "that any person who, in the late war aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss, capture, or destruction by an enemy of any horse, mule, or ox, wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, while such property was in the military service of the United States, either by impressment or contract, except in cases where the risk to which the property would be exposed was agreed to be incurred by the owner, if it shall appear that such loss, capture, or destruction was without any fault or negligence on the part of the owner, and any person who, during the time aforesaid, has sustained damage by the death of any such horse, mule, or ox, in consequence of failure on the part of the United States to furnish the same with sufficient forage while in the service aforesaid, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof."

The Commissioner was at first disposed to consider the first clause of this section as providing only for such injuries as proceeded from the acts of the enemy. But inasmuch as damage by an enemy must almost universally happen in two ways, either "by capture or destruction," and as there were many other losses sustained by our citizens, "without any fault or negligence on the owners," such, for instance, as wagons and teams lost by being forced to attempt to pass streams not fordable, contrary to the opinion of the owners, by the compulsive orders of military commanders, on further reflection, he was inclined to give this clause a more extended meaning, and to consider the word "loss" as intended to be contradistinguished from the words "capture or destruction by an enemy," and to denote such injuries as might have happened in a manner other than "by the capture and destruction of an enemy," but "without any fault or negligence on the part of the owner." But the opinion of the Executive Government being in favor of adhering to the first interpretation, the Commissioner has felt it his duty to conform his adjudication thereto.

The two first sections of the act being strictly conformed to military corps other than regulars, the change of expression in the third section, in which the broad words "any person" are used, seemed to denote that its provisions were intended to apply to every description of citizens, whether they belonged to the regular army, or to the militia, or volunteers ; and inasmuch as the militia and volunteers, while in actual service, received the pay and emoluments of regulars, the Commissioner ultimately inclined to the opinion that losses happening under similar circumstances to persons engaged in either service were intended to be provided for. The word "contract" appeared to him to be of extensive import ; and in every case as well in the regular as in the militia or volunteer service, in which the rank of the officer required that he should furnish himself with a horse ; that, by accepting of his appointment, he entered "into a contract" with the Government to do so ; and having done so, provided such horse died in consequence of a failure on the part of Government to furnish sufficient forage, or was taken by the enemy, that a regular officer ought to be paid for his horse in the same manner as if he had belonged to the militia or volunteer corps. But on this point the Executive Government having considered the regular officer as excluded from this benefit, the Property taken or destroyed by the Enemy.

Commissioner has felt it also his duty to adopt his adjudications to that opinion.

The fourth section admitted of an easy interpretation, applying solely to the loss of "arms and military accoutrements" of volunteers or draughted militiamen who had furnished themselves with the same.

The fifth section is in these words: "That, where any property has been impressed or taken by public authority, for the use or subsistence of the Army during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof, deducting therefrom the amount which has been paid for the use and risk of the same while in the service aforesaid."

This section has been construed to apply to all property, real, personal, or mixed, which has been impressed or taken by public authority, without the consent of the owner. (See papers marked A and B.)

The ninth section of the law providing for losses of greater magnitude, and necessarily involving the payment of large sums of money, the Commissioner endeavored to avail himself of every assistance which appeared to be within his reach, to enable him to give it a fair, a reasonable, and a just interpretation. With this view, erroneously supposing that he had a right to do so, he addressed to the Attorney General, the great law officer of the Government, the letter marked C; in reply to which he received the answer marked D.

Having been disappointed in obtaining this important aid, the Commissioner, regarding the office which he filled as a kind of appendage to the Department of War, addressed to the Secretary thereof the letter marked E, enclosing copies of his correspondence with the Attorney General.

From this officer the Commissioner indulged the hope that he should receive such an exposition as would enable him to fulfil the views of the Legislature, by affording a just redress to the sufferers intended to be relieved. Nor was this expectation disappointed, when the Secretary, after due consideration, and no doubt consulting the best opinions, addressed to him on the 7th of September a note in the following words:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,

September 7, 1816.

SIR: The President has been pleased to direct that the occupation of houses and buildings by the military force of the United States is embraced by the ninth section of the act "to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," and that compensation shall be allowed for damage sustained in consequence of such occupancy, in the same manner as if such houses and buildings had been occupied as a military deposite, under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States. I have, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

RICHARD BLAND LEE, Esq.

The Commissioner considered this letter as sanctioning his own interpretation of the ninth section of the said law; and it was not until after he received this note, that he felt himself authorized to give to it a practical construction by a formal adjudication.

On the 21st of October the Commissioner received from the Department of War, as the organ of the Executive Government, a more general interpretation of the law, in the following words:

WAR DEPARTMENT, October 21, 1816.

Pursuant to the eleventh section of the act making provision for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes, the President has been pleased to direct—

That the first and second sections of the said act do not embrace the case of officers of the regular army, and that the property which a regular officer may have taken with him in the service, or which he may have been required by law to keep, is not comprehended by the terms "impressed or by contract," used in the third section.

That the provisions of the third section extend only to losses resulting from the acts of the enemy, or from the failure of the Government to supply the necessary forage.

That the ninth section of the act extends only to cases of destruction of property by the enemy, which are justifiable by the laws of civilized warfare. The occupation of houses or buildings as places of military deposite, or by an armed force, must be continued up to the time of the destruction. That the occupation of houses or buildings by an armed force for a night upon a march, is not within the meaning of the said section, unless in the immediate presence of an enemy. That no compensation by way of interest, rent, or damage, can be allowed, under the act, for the time which elapses between the destruction of the property and the decision of the Commissioner.

That the act does not extend to the case of consequential injury resulting from the destruction of houses or buildings under the ninth section.

No compensation can, therefore, be allowed for the destruction of houses or buildings not occupied as a military deposite or by a military force.

That, in all cases of doubt, or of great importance, the Commissioner shall submit the evidence to the Executive before any decision is made.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

RICHARD BLAND LEE, Esq.,

Commissioner, &c.

The Commissioner will close this subject, by referring to his correspondence with the Department of War, marked F.

The number of adjudications made and entered by him since the 1st of July, under special acts, and under the general law of the 9th of April last, amount to eight hundred and fifty; the total sum awarded, to $228,693 15.

Property taken or destroyed by the Enemy.

The proofs, in every case decided by the Commissioner, are put into a trunk, the key of which will be delivered to the Acting Secretary of War; which papers are so sent in conformity to the direction of the President, and pursuant to a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, bearing date on the 16th instant; a copy of which letter is referred to in paper marked G.

In the office a record of all the adjudications was made, and the evidence in each particular claim was filed with it. The office was at all times open, and free liberty allowed to every citizen to examine either the adjudications or the evidence.

All which is most respectfully submitted.

RICHARD BLAND LEE,
Commissioner, &c.

P. S. The Commissioner thinks proper to send a copy of his letter to the Secretary of the Navy, in the case of William O'Neale and Robert Taylor, dated on the 2d of October last, marked H.

He also begs leave to refer to certain acts passed at the last session of Congress; many, if not all, of which he considered as contemporaneous expositions of the law which created this office:

An act for the relief of William Flood.

An act for the relief of the supervisors of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York.

An act for the relief of Joseph Wilson.

An act for the relief of Asher Palmer.

OFFICE OF CLAIMS, &c.,
Washington, June 3, 1816.

Notice is hereby given, pursuant to the act of the United States passed the 9th of April last, entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," that all claims provided for by the said act must be presented at this office on or before the 9th day of April, in the year 1818, as, if not presented within that period, they cannot be received, examined, and decided on at this office.

First class of cases.

The claims provided for by the said act are, first: "Any volunteer or draughted militiaman, whether of cavalry, mounted riflemen, or infantry, who, in the late war between the United States and Great Britain, has sustained damage by the loss of any horse which was killed in any battle, or which has died in consequence of a wound therein received, or in consequence of failure on the part of the United States to furnish such horse with sufficient forage while in the service of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the value of such horse." This provision comprehends three descriptions of cases:

1. A horse killed in battle.

2. A horse dying in consequence of a wound received in battle.

3. A horse dying in consequence of not being furnished with sufficient forage by the United States.

To substantiate a claim of either description:

1. The order of the Government authorizing the employment of the corps to which the original claimant belonged, or the subsequent acceptance of such corps, or approbation of its employment, must be produced.

2. The certificate of the officer, or surviving officer, commanding the claimant at the time of the accident on which the claim is founded, which certificate, if not given while the officer was in the service of the United States, must be sworn to; and in every case it must, if practicable, state the then value of the horse so killed or dying. Before any other evidence will be received, the claimant must make oath that it is not in his power to procure that which is above specified; and that the evidence which he shall produce in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain. In every case the evidence must be on oath, and the value of the horse so killed or dying ascertained. All evidence offered must be taken and authenticated in the manner hereinafter directed; and in all these cases the claimant must declare on oath that he has not received another horse from any officer or agent of the Government in lieu of the one lost.

Second class of cases.

"Any person, whether of cavalry or mounted riflemen, or volunteers, who, in the late war aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss of a horse, in consequence of the owner thereof being dismounted, or separated and detached from the same, by order of the commanding officer, or in consequence of the rider being killed or wounded in battle, shall be allowed and paid the value of such horse at the time he was received into the public service."

This class comprehends two descriptions of cases:

1. When the owner has been dismounted, or separated from and detached from such horse, by order of the commanding officer.

2. When the rider has been killed or wounded in battle, and the horse lost in consequence thereof.

The same evidence, in all respects, which is required in the first class of cases, will be required in this.

Third class of cases.

"Any person who, in the late war aforesaid, has sustained damage by the loss, capture, or destruction by an enemy of any horse, mule, or ox, wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, while such property was employed in the military service of the United States, either by impressment or by contract, except in cases where the risk to which the property would be exposed was agreed to be incurred by the owner, if it shall appear that such loss, capture, or destruction was without any fault or negligence of the owner, and any person during the time aforesaid, who has sustained damage by the death of such horse, mule, or ox, in consequence of failure on the part of the United States to furnish sufficient forage while in the service aforesaid, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof." This class comprehends two cases:

Property taken or destroyed by the Enemy.

1. The loss or destruction of property by an enemy, taken by impressment, or engaged by contract, in the military service of the United States, being either a horse, a mule, an ox, wagon, cart, boat, sleigh, or harness, excepting articles for which the owners had agreed to run all risks, or which were lost or destroyed by the fault or negligence of the owners.

2. When a horse, mule, or ox, so taken or employed, has died from the failure of the United States to furnish sufficient forage.

In the first of these cases, the claimant must produce the certificate of the officer or agent of the United States who impressed or contracted for the property above mentioned, and of the officer or surviving officer under whose immediate command it was taken or destroyed by an enemy. Such certificates, if such officers or agents at the time of giving them, be not in the military service of the United States, must be sworn to, and must positively state that the property was not lost or destroyed through the fault or negligence of the owner, and that the owner did not agree to run all risks. Furthermore, the usual rate of hire of the articles so impressed or contracted for in the country in which they were employed must be stated.

In the second case, the certificate of the officer or agent of the United States, under whose command such horse, mule, or ox, was employed at the time of his death, must be produced.

Before any other evidence will be received, the claimant must make oath that it is not in his power to produce that which is above specified; and, further, that the evidence which he offers in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain. In every case the evidence must state distinctly the time, place, and manner of the loss, and the value thereof.

Fourth class of cases.

"Any person who, during the late war, has acted in the military service of the United States as a volunteer or draughted militiaman, and who has furnished himself with arms or accoutrements, and has sustained loss by the capture or destruction of them, without any fault or negligence on his part, shall be allowed and paid the value thereof."

This class comprehends two cases:

1. The loss of such arms or accoutrements by the enemy.

2. The loss of the same articles in any other way, without the fault or negligence of the owner.

The provision does not include the clothing of soldiers, or the clothing and arms of officers who, in all services, furnish at their own risk their own. The same evidence, in all respects, is required in this and in the first class, and, moreover, that the loss did not happen from the fault or negligence of the owner.

Fifth class of cases.

"When any property has been impressed or taken by public authority for the use or subsistence of the Army during the late war, and the same shall have been destroyed, lost, or consumed, the owner of such property shall be paid the value thereof, deducting therefrom the amount which has been paid, or may be claimed, for the use and risk of the same while in the service aforesaid."

This provision relates to every species of property taken or impressed for the use and subsistence of the Army, not comprehended in any of the preceding classes, and which shall have been in any manner destroyed, lost, or consumed by the army, including in its scope all kinds of provisions, forage, fuel, articles for clothing, blankets, arms, and ammunition; in fact, everything for the use and equipment of an army.

In all these cases, the certificates of the officers or agents of the United States taking or impressing any of the aforesaid articles, authenticated by the officer commanding the corps for whose use they were taken or impressed, and, furthermore, of the officers and agents under whose command the same were destroyed, lost, or consumed, specifying the value of the articles so taken or impressed, and destroyed, lost, or consumed, and, if any payment has been made for the use of the same, and the amount of such payment, [must be furnished;] and if no payment has been made, the certificate must state that none has been made.

Before any other evidence will be received, the claimant must make oath that it is not in his power to procure that which is above specified; and, further, that the evidence which he offers in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain.

Under this provision, no claim can be admitted for any article which has not been taken by the orders of the commandant of the corps for whose use it may be stated to have been taken. For any taking not so authorized, the party's redress is against the person committing it.

Sixth (and last) class of cases.

"Where any person, during the late war, has sustained damage by the destruction of his house or building by the enemy, while the same was occupied as a military deposite under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, he shall be allowed or paid the amount of such damage, provided it shall appear that such occupation was the cause of its destruction."

In this case the certificate of the officer or agent of the United States under whose authority any such house or building was occupied must be furnished. Before any other evidence as to this fact will be received, the claimant must make oath that it is not in his power to procure such certificate, and that the evidence which he shall offer in lieu thereof is the best which he is able to obtain.

Furthermore, in all the cases submitted to this office, every claim must be accompanied by a statement, on oath, by every claimant, of all sums which he may have received on account of such claim from any officer, agent, or department of the Government of the United States; and where he has received nothing, that fact also must be stated, on oath, by him.

It will be particularly noted by claimants that the preceding rules of evidence generally, and more especially, apply to claims which shall not exceed in amount two hundred dollars, and that, in all cases in which the claims in amount shall exceed two hundred dollars, a special commissioner will be employed to take testimony; but in these cases, as far as it shall be practicable, the same rules of evidence will be observed.

In all cases in which the officers or agents of the United States shall have taken or impressed property for the military service of the United States, which property, so taken or impressed, shall have been paid for by them out of their private funds, or the value thereof recovered from them in due course of law, such officers or agents are entitled to the same remuneration to which the original owners of the property would be entitled if such payment or recovery had not been made, and can settle their claims at this office, producing authentic vouchers for such payment or recovery. Nor will any original claimants be paid through this office till they release all claims against such officers or agents of the United States on account of such taking or impressment.

In every case, no claim will be paid but to persons originally entitled to receive the same; or in case of his death, to the legal representative, or, in either event, attorney duly appointed. When attorneys shall be employed, it is recommended to the parties interested to have their powers executed in due form.

All evidence offered must be sworn to, except the certificates of officers who, at the time of giving them, shall be in the military service of the United States, before some judge of the United States, or of the States or Territories of the United States, or mayor or chief magistrate of any city, town, or borough, within the same, or a justice of the peace of any State or Territory of the United States duly authorized to administer oaths; of which authority proof must be furnished either by a certificate under the seal of any State or Territory, or the clerk or prothonotary of any court within the same. But the seal of any city, town, or borough, or the attestation of any judge of the United States, will require no further authentication.

An office is opened on Capitol Hill, in the City of Washington, in the building occupied by Congress during its last session, for the reception of the foregoing claims.

The printers in the United States, or Territories thereof, who are employed to print the laws of the United States, are requested to publish this notice for eight weeks successively, once a week, and send their bills to this office for payment.

All persons who have business with this office are requested to address their letters to the subscriber, as Commissioner, which will be transmitted free of postage.

Explanatory Supplemental Rule.

OFFICE OF CLAIMS, &c.,
Washington, June 24, 1816.

In all the cases comprised in the notice from this office of the 3d instant, the following supplemental regulation must be observed by every claimant, viz:

Whenever the evidence, on oath, of any officer of the late army of the United States shall be taken, or the certificate of any officer in service at the time of giving it shall be obtained, such evidence or such certificate must expressly state whether any certificate or other voucher, in relation to the claim in question, has been given within the knowledge of such officer. The claimant must also declare, on oath, that he has never received from any person any such certificate or voucher, or, if received, must state the cause of its non-production. In every case the name of the officer furnishing such certificate or voucher, together with its date, as near as can be ascertained, will also be required.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 21, 1816.

Pursuant to the eleventh section of the act "making provision for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," the President has been pleased to direct—

That the first and second sections of the said act do not embrace the cases of officers of the regular army; and that the property which a regular officer may have taken with him in the service, or which he may have been required by law to keep, is not comprehended by the terms "impressed or by contract" used in the third section.

That the provisions of the third section extend only to losses resulting from the acts of the enemy, or from the failure of the Government to supply the necessary forage.

That the ninth section of the act extends only to cases of destruction of property by the enemy which are justifiable by the laws of civilized warfare. The occupation of houses or buildings as places of military deposit, or by an armed force, must be continued up to the time of the destruction.

Property taken or destroyed by the Enemy.

That the occupation of houses or buildings by an armed force for a night upon a march is not within the meaning of the said section, unless in the immediate presence of an enemy.

That no compensation, by way of interest, rent, or damage, can be allowed under the act for the time which elapses between the destruction of the property and the decision of the Commissioner.

That the act does not extend to the case of consequential injury resulting from the destruction of houses or buildings under the ninth section. No compensation can, therefore, be allowed for the destruction of houses or buildings not occupied as a military deposite, or by a military force.

That, in all cases of doubt or of great importance, the Commissioner shall submit the evidence to the Executive before any decision is made.

OFFICE OF CLAIMS, &c.,
Washington, July 1, 1816.

SIR: Several claims have been submitted to me as provided for by the ninth section of the law of the United States entitled "An act to authorize the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes." The words of the law are: "Where any person, during the late war, has sustained damage by the destruction of his or her house or building by the enemy, while the same was occupied as a military deposite under the authority of an officer or agent of the United States, he shall be allowed and paid the amount of such damage, provided it shall appear that such occupation was the cause of its destruction."

I find a difficulty in determining what shall be deemed "a military deposite" in the meaning of the law.

1. Must the term be limited to the storing of munitions of war?

2. Can it be extended to a military occupation, however transient, as quarters for soldiers for a month, a week, a day, or a less time?

3. In a day of battle, if soldiers retire to a house to use it as a fortress from which to annoy the enemy, without the order of an officer, will such occupation be within the meaning of the law?

4. In a day of battle, if soldiers occupy a house for such purposes by order of an officer, however inferior may be his grade, will such occupation be within the meaning of the law?

Your official answers to the foregoing questions will very much oblige your obedient servant,

RICHARD BLAND LEE.

WASHINGTON, July 3, 1816.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter dated the 1st of this month.

The thirty-fifth section of the act of Congress of the 24th of September, 1789, is the only law marking down the public duties to be performed by the Attorney General, and I have never felt myself at liberty to assume the responsibility of official opinions not enjoined by the terms or scope of that law.

I beg you, sir, to be assured that nothing but an unwillingness to depart from this rule (which has also, I believe, governed those who have heretofore been Attorney General) leads me to decline giving answers to the questions which your letter has propounded for my consideration.

With great respect, &c.

SIR: I enclose to you a copy of my letter of the 1st instant to the honorable Attorney General, and a copy of his reply of the 3d. OFFICE OF CLAIMS, &c., Washington, October 28, 1816.

SIR: As I find, from conversation with Mr. Graham, Chief Clerk of the War Department, that a doubt is entertained by him whether the claims of the inhabitants of Buffalo, whose houses were destroyed by the enemy on the 30th of December, 1813, and on the 1st of January, 1814, come within the provisions of the ninth section of the law of the 9th of April last, under which I act, I deem it proper to submit to the consideration of the President the testimony in the case of Gilman Fulsom before I definitively decide. This case does not rest on such strong evidence as the few in which I have made awards. From my conversation with Mr. Graham, the principal objection to the Buffalo claims is derived, as I understand, from the official declaration of the enemy to our Government that the village of Buffalo was burnt by way of retaliation. I will observe, that I have not been furnished with this information in an official form, or received any intimation from the Executive Government how far it must be regarded in opposition to the testimony of our own citizens, taken in pursuance of the directions of the aforesaid law of the 9th of April last.

It is certain that this office has not the power of going out of the limits of the United States to take testimony; and the most natural place to obtain the best testimony which the nature of the case may admit of appeared to be where the destruction was made. In selecting persons to take this testimony, I have sought out such as stood high in the confidence of the government of New York, and who held respectable judicial stations. I have endeavored, in every instance, both in the regulations concerning the mode of taking and authenticating the testimony, and examining that testimony when furnished, to fulfil the injunction of the law, by "paying a due respect as well to the claims of individual justice as to the interest of the United States," which, in my opinion, will be more certainly promoted and permanently established by acts of justice and restitution to its citizens who have innocently suffered in a war waged for the common benefit, than consigning them to undeserved misery and want, in imitation of Governments which are created and supported by military force, and do not rest, like ours, on the basis of justice and equality of rights.

I am very sensible that, in the adjudications which I am bound to make, it will be extremely difficult always to hit precisely the middle course of rendering a reasonable justice to the claimant without in any degree trenching upon the interest of the nation. But here humanity, considering the relative situation of the parties, will excuse (if they should be discovered) a bearing to the side of poverty and wretchedness. Enclosed I send also a newspaper, which exhibits the course which the British Government has pursued relative to the losses sustained by their Canadian subjects during the late war, as well from the acts of their enemy as their own army.

I shall be happy to receive from the President his instructions relative to the case herewith sent, which I shall consider it my duty to obey. Till then, I shall suspend all adjudications under the ninth section of the law. I am confidently impressed that the awards, in all the cases which I have hitherto decided, relative to buildings destroyed by the enemy during the late war, will be found in conformity to the interpretation and instructions which I have received from him, unless the Buffalo cases shall be excluded by the official declaration of the enemy.

I have the honor to be, &c.

*Annuities to Widow and Children of A. H. Dohrman.ANNUITIES TO WIDOW AND CHILDREN OF A. H. DOHRMAN.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 27, 1817.]

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Rachael Dohrman, report:

That, in the documents accompanying the petition, the committee find very satisfactory evidence that the late husband of the petitioner, Arnold Henry Dohrman, rendered important services to the United States during the Revolution, by acts of exalted beneficence and liberality towards American seamen thrown captive on the shores of Portugal by a vindictive enemy, where the said Dohrman then resided. The sense of obligation which prevailed in this country for those meritorious services, in the year 1770, may be estimated from original letters from President Adams, President Jefferson, and Governor Henry, of Virginia. By a resolve of Congress, on the 21st of June, 1780, said Dohrman was appointed agent for the United States at the Court of Lisbon. In a report preceding the resolve, the committee state they "are assured said Dohrman wishes for no salary or emolument for his services, but simply a repayment of his advances, when it shall be most convenient." Original letters are also exhibited from General Washington and Archibald Casey, Speaker of the Virginia Senate, written in 1785, and bearing the strongest testimony to the merits of said Dohrman.

About this period Arnold Henry Dohrman appears to have petitioned Congress for a settlement of his accounts, and for an allowance of a reasonable compensation for his services as agent, which the derangement of his private affairs, arising out of his connexion with and attention to the business of the United States, had made necessary.

On the 1st of October, 1787, Congress resolved to reimburse said Dohrman upwards of $5,000, with interest from the time of expenditure, such sum having been admitted to be due on settlement at the Treasury; and for a further claim of upwards of $20,000, for which documents were offered of too general a nature to admit of settlement by the rules of the Treasury, it was further resolved unanimously "that said Dohrman, for his faithful and generous services as agent of the United States at the Court of Lisbon, should be allowed $1,600 per annum, to be computed from the time his expenditures commenced;" and that he should select a township, at his option, out of the three last ranges surveyed in the Western Territory, free from all charges of survey, after the Secretary of War had drawn the proportionate quantity assigned to the late army; and that the payments and grant of land so made should be in full for all claims of said Dohrman against the United States. Mr. Dohrman appears to have been extremely unfortunate, without fault, in the selection of his township, as is fully set forth in letters from David Hogg and James Ross.

Mr. Dohrman died at Steubenville in 1813, leaving a widow, the petitioner, and eleven minor children, in extreme penury, who now prefer their petition for relief. Instances exist, in the opinion of the committee, where benefits have been extended by Congress of not stronger equity or materially dissimilar principles. The committee conceive the very liberal adjustment of this claim by the Congress in 1787 is the highest proof of Mr. Dohrman's distinguished merits. As he has failed to realize the benefit intended for him by the grant of his township, through real misfortune, the committee apprehend the principles of equity admit of an equivalent being extended to his helpless family, especially as it is believed the United States have received the value of the land he might have selected, but which not to have done was his misfortune. The committee therefore respectfully submit the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draught and report a bill allowing $— annually to Rachael Dohrman, widow of Arnold Henry Dohrman, during such time as she may remain a widow, payable quarterly; and $— annually to each of the minor children of said Dohrman until they shall respectively arrive at the age of twenty-one years; which benefits shall be received and applied under the superintendence of the Orphans' Court of the proper county.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress:

The petition of Rachael Dohrman, widow of Arnold Robert Dohrman, Esq., deceased, humbly sheweth: That the said Arnold Henry Dohrmahn died at Steubenville, in the State of Ohio, early in the year 1813, leaving your petitioner and eleven minor children without any means whatever for their subsistence and protection; that, for almost four years, your petitioner has struggled with the hard vicissitudes which attend the maintenance and education of a large family of infant and helpless children, without any resource other than that which her hands afforded her, and the charitable aid which she has received from her kind and beneficent neighbors. From the first of these, age and sickness admonish her to expect but little in future; to the second, she feels that she has already been too often a suppliant, and too long a debtor; that the overwhelming reflection which her future prospect presents, of seeing her children, the offspring of Arnold Henry Dohrman, not only deprived of the substantial comforts and necessities of life, but stepping upon the stage of active life and business, destitute of all the intellectual acquirements which their father enjoyed, has induced your petitioner to overcome her prejudices of education and finer sensibilities on the subject, and present herself and her children, with their wants and distresses, before the guardian powers of that country for whose interest and independence, in the hour of peril, Mr. Dohrman exposed his life and sacrificed his fortune.

It is due to your honorable legislative bodies that your petitioner suggest the reasons wherefore she ventures to supplicate the consideration of Congress to her distresses; she, therefore, very respectfully appeals to the journals of the American Legislature for the years A. D 1785, '6, and '7, from which it will appear that, during the struggle of the United States for liberty and independence, Mr. Dohrman's "own house in Portugal was frequently the asylum of whole crews of captive American seamen, who were fed, clothed, and relieved in sickness through his benevolence, and that at a time when his attachment to the cause of America was dangerous both to his person and property;" that, while an entire stranger to every citizen of these then colonies, he ventured to be their only friend in a Kingdom in alliance with, and under the influence of their powerful enemy; that he was afterwards selected as the agent and consul of these then United Colonies to the Kingdom of Portugal, and discharged that trust in such a manner as to have received, not only from the Congress the approbation of the nation, but also the voluntary testimonials of respect and thanks from the governments of the several States. Your petitioner also appeals to the memorials of many living worthies of those bright days of American glory, and flatters herself she may be excused for dwelling with a grateful and pleasing thought on the testimony of Mr. Dohrman's services, voluntarily recorded of him by the illustrious founders of American independence, General Washington, Hon. Patrick Henry, President Adams, President Jefferson, and many others; some of whom, though she forbears to mention their names, she knows were the warm and active friends of Mr. Dohrman, and on whom she now rests a fond hope, knowing that they yet live ornaments of their country, and intrusted with its welfare and its honor.

Your petitioner is not unadvised that Mr. Dohrman received a compensation for his services as agent of the United States at Portugal, and also a donation in lands, as a remuneration for his sacrifices and services in favor of American seamen; nor does she complain of the want of munificence or gratitude on the part of the United States towards Mr. Dohrman, but, on the contrary, she bears witness of the liberal spirit with which Mr. Dohrman was treated, not only by the worthy personages before named and alluded to, but also by the national councils of this his adopted country; but she feels that she may be permitted to remind the guardians of this great and happy people, that the services of "one who," in the language of Governor Henry, of Virginia, "unallied to them by any ties of kindred or country, opened his purse to their distressed captive countrymen, and took them to his bosom as his brethren," are not to be estimated by any weight or measure; and that the reward which the Congress of the United States intended in their donation of lands for Mr. Dohrman, was not (on account of an unfortunate selection of a township) realized to Mr. Dohrman to one-half of its supposed extent. Mr. Dohrman was entirely ignorant of land himself, and confiding in erroneous information of others, or misled by false misrepresentations of its quality and situation, instead of a township of even an average worth or quality, he chose one worth less than any other out of which he was entitled to make his selection. And though in this he could have no cause of complaint against the United States, yet, inasmuch as Congress designed for him a greater remuneration than he realized, and the United States Treasury has profited by his unfavorable selection, your petitioner humbly conceives she may well be excused if she has formed too sanguine hopes of a further consideration of the subject by the National Legislature; and even then she trusts that, if noble deeds of patriotism, valor, virtue, or humanity, will anywhere on earth rescue the offspring of the actor from penury and distress, the children of Mr. Dohrman have yet a pledge of promise in the hearts of the American people.

Your petitioner prays to be indulged in the further humble representation that a continued series of misfortunes and disappointments had pursued Mr. Dohrman from the first moment his own house became the asylum of distressed American captives in Portugal until his death, in 1813, in Steubenville, Ohio. Educated in European manners, and indulged in early life in the lap of fortune, he was but too little prepared to meet and buffet the stubborn realities and busy toils of an American merchant or agriculturist. He was, therefore, disappointed in his expectations; embarrassed in his circumstances; his soul was too great to murmur; education had taught him not to supplicate; the little value and dead capital of his land rendered his estate insolvent, and he died the child and victim of despair and sorrow, consoled in his last moments by the animating and pleasing reflection, that though his wife and children were about to become the objects of an eleemosynary subsistence, he left them free in the land he had sought for his home and his sepulchre, and for whose political happiness, though he had sacrificed his own, and depauperated his children, yet they were left to be cherished by those whom he, in his turn, had "fed, clothed, and relieved from sickness." Your petitioner forbears further to relate, but throws herself and children upon the bounty and liberal protection of an enlightened people, and will ever pray.

RACHAEL DOHRMAN.

STEUBENVILLE, OHIO, Jan. 6, 1817.

BY THE U. S. IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED,
June 21, 1780.

The Committee of Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of 23d May from Mr. P. Henry, late Governor of Virginia, report:

That, from the said letter and other papers laid before them, as well as from the information of Mr. G. Anderson, they find that Mr. Arnold Henry Dohrman, merchant of Lisbon, hath, from the commencement of the present war, manifested a warm and steady attachment to the cause and interests of the United States; that he hath expended large sums of money in carrying into practice schemes projected by him for assisting them with clothing and warlike stores, as well in supplying great numbers of American prisoners carried into the ports of the Kingdom of Portugal with money and all other necessities for their comfortable subsistence while there, and for their return to their own country by such routes as they preferred; that, from the great wealth and influence, and the favorable disposition of the said Arnold Henry Dohrman, many benefits might be derived to these States by enabling him to be more publicly and extensively useful under the sanction of authority from Congress; that the committee are assured the said Mr. Dohrman wishes for no salary or emolument for his services, but simply a repayment of his advances when it shall be most convenient: whereupon,

Resolved, That Arnold Henry Dohrman, of the city of Lisbon, merchant, be appointed agent for the United States in the Kingdom of Portugal, for the transaction of such affairs of the said States as may be committed to his discretion.

CHAS. THOMSON, Sec'y.

To the Honorable the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

The memorial and petition of Arnold Henry Dohrman, of Lisbon, in the Kingdom of Portugal, agent for the said United States, respectfully show:

That your memorialist (by birth a subject of the Netherlands) was, at the commencement of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, a resident at Lisbon, in the Kingdom of Portugal, possessed of handsome property, and in full credit as a merchant.

That, having imbibed from early life a strong attachment to the principles of liberty, he saw with anxious and affectionate concern the first efforts of this country to defend and secure the rights of human nature; and carried along by a desire to espouse its cause, unsolicited, and without hope or expectation of reward, at a period, too, when European prejudices and opinions wished and predicted the ruin of that cause, he resolved to devote himself to it by the best services his situation would permit.

That the object which presented itself to him as the one in which he could best execute this resolution with advantage to America, was the preservation and relief of captive seamen whom the fortune of war would throw within his reach. These in considerable numbers, at different times, as well in Spain and in the Western islands as throughout the Kingdom of Portugal, he assisted with supplies of food, medicine, care, clothing, and the means of transporting themselves back to America. His own house frequently received whole crews from the prison ships, from whence the sick and wounded were sent to hospitals, and where the well were entertained and supported till opportunities could be found for their return home; for which purpose they were supplied with every necessary.

That the execution of this plan was attended with great hazard as well as great expense and loss to your memorialist, who soon became an object of the resentment and persecution of the Court of London; upon whose instances with the Court of Portugal, * * * * * your memorialist was forbidden, on pain of banishment, from continuing his assistance to the Americans; but his attachment to their cause would not suffer him to be deterred by menaces or dangers from persisting in what he considered as a duty he owed to the cause of humanity and liberty.

That, happily for him, the events of war favoring the hopes of America, and procuring the countenance of some of the most respectable Powers of Europe, prevented the execution of these menaces; and your honorable body, some time in the year 1780, having been informed of the good-will of your memorialist, and having been pleased, unasked by him, to reward him with the appointment of agent at the Court of Lisbon, your memorialist had the satisfaction (though not recognised by that Court till after the peace) to continue his zealous endeavors for their service, under the authority and sanction of the United States.

That too much of your memorialist's time, attention, and money, was employed in the prosecution of these views, to consist with the prosperity of his private affairs. The diminution of his funds, the disgusts and fears of his friends on account of the part he took, the critical position in which he for a long time stood with the Government, concurred in the ruin of his mercantile credit and interest. The consequence is, that he now stands in need of the bounty of Congress, for what he hopes he has deserved, but never intended, till urged by necessity, and invited by the complete success of the Revolution, to ask a reimbursement of his expenses, and a reasonable compensation for his services.

That, actuated by a strong desire of visiting that land of liberty he so long loved, admired, and served, and of manifesting upon the spot his respect for that august body whose wisdom has founded the American Republic, and at the same time hoping that his presence would enable him to give a more satisfactory explanation of his services and pretensions, your memorialist some time since communicated to Congress his intention to embark for America; which he has since done, leaving his brother, Jacob Dohrman, his substitute at the Court of Lisbon, who has accordingly been received in that capacity, and whose abilities and influence will more than supply the absence of your memorialist.

That your memorialist, being now arrived at the seat of Congress, is happy in the opportunity it affords him of renewing to your honorable body the assurances of his unalterable respect and veneration.

That your memorialist, confident he may expect from the justice and generosity of the country in whose fate he has so warmly interested himself, not only a proper indemnity for his expenses, losses, and sacrifices, but also an adequate compensation for his services, has only to regret that the circumstances under which those expenses were incurred, and those services performed, do not permit him to offer to Congress vouchers for many of the articles which compose his claim. Your memorialist cannot, however, but flatter himself that indulgent allowances will be made for his situation; to entitle him to which, he begs leave to suggest the following facts:

That a great part of the time he kept no regular accounts; that a considerable proportion of the expense was incurred under his own roof, and confounded with other family disbursements for the subsistence of the prisoners whom he, from time to time, received in his house; that much of what he did was done in a secret manner, to elude public observation, and of course under pretexts and appearances which would not admit of vouchers of the facts; and, in the last place, that he was often obliged, for his own security, to deposite his papers out of his possession; by which means many of them were at different times lost.

Your memorialist, therefore, to supply any deficiencies which may appear, must rely on the notoriety of his sacrifices and services, and must appeal to the accounts received by some of the members of your own body, and to the testimony of respectable individuals now on this continent, which, in the progress of the business, your memorialist, if required, will endeavor to produce.

That your memorialist, having little more in his power than to exhibit a general sketch of the objects of his expenditures, begs leave herewith to submit the same to the consideration of your honorable body, recalling to the attention of Congress the time and circumstances under which he first gave proofs of his attachment to the American cause, the peculiarity of those proofs, the voluntary and disinterested manner in which they were given, by a stranger to the country, and no otherwise allied to its interests than by the sympathy of common principles; the actual sacrifices and personal danger with which they were attended; the instrumentality of your memorialist in preserving to the United States many valuable subjects, part of whom would have lost their lives for want of proper assistance, and others would have been compelled by their necessities to engage in the service of the enemy; the singular situation to which his unsought interference would have reduced him had the Revolution failed; and, in the last place, to the distress and embarrassment which he in fact experienced in consequence of the application of his funds and time to its advancement, &c. Your petitioner will ever pray, &c. A. H. DOHRMAN.

[Presented to Congress, July 19, 1786.]

PARIS, May 16, 1780.

SIR: I have received the letter which you did me the honor of writing to me the 11th of April, in which you inform me that more than six hundred of my unfortunate countrymen have received succors from you, without which they must have been reduced to despair, or forced to engage on board the vessels of their enemies.

In this, sir, you have distinguished yourself by efforts of humanity, which do you great honor, and which deserve more imitation in countries where it is a pity there is so much occasion for them. There would not be so much occasion for them in Portugal, give me leave to say, if it were not for the free admission of British men-of-war and privateers into their harbors, and for the rigorous and impolitic, and I must add unjust, exclusion of American men-of-war and privateers from those ports. Americans have done no injury to Portugal, to deserve a treatment so partial; on the contrary, the long and free intercourse of commerce between America and that kingdom gives them a right to have expected a treatment less hostile. My countrymen, however, ought not to be less thankful to you for your generosity; on the contrary, they ought to prize it the higher. You will please to accept of my thanks as an individual who feels himself obliged to every gentleman, of whatever country, who is good enough to assist his unfortunate countrymen.

I shall take the liberty to enclose your letter to Congress, or a copy of it; but, lest mine should miscarry, I should advise you to write to the President of Congress yourself, and send your letter by some of the Americans who may be at Lisbon.

I am very sorry for Captain Cunningham's captivity, who has deserved well of his country. I was informed of it by a letter from Lisbon before from Mr. Calf, to whom I would write if I did not suppose him gone from Lisbon. I waited on his excellency Dr. Franklin immediately, to inform him, who tells me he has taken such measures as were in his power for the relief of Capt. Cunningham.

I am, with much respect, your obliged and obedient humble servant,

JOHN ADAMS.

Mr. ARNOLD H. DOHRMAN.

VIRGINIA, May 24, 1780.

SIR: The many kindnesses which you have shown to our captive countrymen whom the fortune of war has carried within the reach of your inquiries do great honor to your humanity, and must forever interest us in your welfare. I beg leave, on behalf of my countrymen, to assure you that these attentions are felt with sensibility, and that any occasion which shall offer of rendering you service will be cheerfully embraced. Should future events open an intercourse between your country and ours, for the exchanges of productions yielded by the one and wanted by the other, your actions have pointed out the friend to whose negotiations we may safely confide our interests and necessities.

I beg leave to subscribe myself, with the great-

TO ARNOLD HENRY DOHRMAN, Esq.

RICHMOND TOWN, IN VIRGINIA.
December 12, 1780.

DEAR AND WORTHY SIR: Understanding that there is a conveyance to you by a vessel just about to sail, I sit down, in great hurry of business, to write you this letter. I know not if you have received those already written and sent, and perhaps may repeat some things formerly mentioned, which the uncertainty of conveyances, I hope, will excuse. I must again present my best acknowledgments and thanks for the generous present you ordered to me. Mr. Anderson informs me of it; and, although the accidents of war deprived me of receiving the articles your undeserved generosity intended for me, yet the enemy could not take from me that which your liberality designed—I mean your esteem and regard. Of these I am happy to find myself in possession; and I can assure you that, in return, I give you mine, with all the sincerity and warmth a high sense of gratitude for benefits conferred on my suffering and distressed countrymen can inspire. These benefits can only be equalled by the noble and disinterested manner in which they are conferred; and I hope I shall not be charged with flattery when I say that, among the transactions of this interesting time, some friend to virtue I hope will be found who may record the fact, and inform the world that there lives a man who turned his eyes from scenes of grandeur, dissipation, and the allurements of wealth and pleasure, to behold the virtuous sons of America struggling for the rights of human nature; and, although unallied to them by any ties of country or kindred, he opened his purse to them as distressed captives, and took them to his bosom as brethren. As an American I thank you, sir; and, as a lover of those virtues that adorn our nature, I congratulate myself to see it thus rescued from the general charge of degeneracy. I know how little valuable, in general, empty praises are, especially those that come from this distant part of the world; but they are all we have to give at present. For the present, therefore, accept from me this only tribute which I can give to your merit. Perhaps time may furnish the means of something more substantial in return.

I took the liberty to mention you to Congress. They have been pleased to appoint you agent for the United American States in your country. I wished this to be done, as a mark of regard to you, and beg your excuse if you wished it not to be done. Perhaps, after this appointment, nothing which this particular State could do would be worth attending to of a similar nature.

Your friend, Mr. George Anderson, has often mentioned to me the case of Captain Felt, and I have given him the best assistance in my power in that and every other matter. Indeed, his diligence, assiduity, and alertness are so great that I am confident he will omit nothing for your interest. I can assure you I am happy that I was instrumental in ushering him into your notice and regard, because I am sure he will do your business well and effectually, and he possesses uncommon diligence, joined to capacity and integrity; and be assured I will lend him my assistance and best advice for your interest.

I am at present in private life, except that I am chosen a representative in our Legislative Assembly. The first part of this war I spent in public life; and, from the excessive load of business, I was glad to see the end of three years, to which my office was limited by law. My dwelling is far inland, in the county of Henry, to which place letters to me will be addressed.

At present, the war is changed from the northern to the southern part of the continent. The capture of Charleston has raised our enemy's spirits, although it is of not so great consequence as they affect to believe. Very lately we killed and took prisoners the whole of a party of eleven hundred and odd, that advanced up into the country supposed to be conquered, and none of the party escaped to tell the news. This exploit was achieved by Colonel William Campbell, my brother-in-law, with nine hundred militia, armed only with rifles, and no hand weapons, while the enemy were posted on the top of a mountain, behind their defences. It is accounted one of the greatest exploits performed in America during this war, and has disconcerted the enemy greatly. However, they are preparing to act against us in the South with vigor, and we are preparing for the event of another campaign. It will be pretty obstinate, I believe. The northern States I consider as quite given up by Great Britain, and their only remaining hopes fixed on the southern, where the people are not so warlike, and, from their smaller numbers, not able to resist so effectually; but our forces will march from the North, and, I trust, continue the contest with effect.

It will give me great pleasure to correspond with you, and, on all occasions, to show you that, with the most sincere regard and esteem,

I am, dear sir, your affectionate friend and very humble servant,

PATRICK HENRY.

ARNOLD HENRY DOHRMAN, Esq.

RICHMOND, January 1, 1785.

SIR: It was not before yesterday that the Senate of Virginia had official knowledge of you, sir, and therefore could not have been acquainted with your conduct in respect to our unhappy countrymen (as well as to others of our sister States) carried prisoners into Lisbon by our cruel and unnatural enemies the British. Struck with surprise on having in proof the numberless instances of your unparalleled acts of generosity to them, and the dangers you run at a time when your Court had shown no open act by which we had reason to expect friendship from her, and when she was in close alliance with our enemies, we cannot tell which most to admire, your Christian virtues, or your fortitude in exposing your person and fortune to the machinations of our enemies, then in high interest with the august house who governs your country, and with whom we think ourselves extremely happy in having formed, since our independence has been established, a connexion, which we most heartily pray may be continued on the most enlarged and liberal principles. It is with pleasure, sir, we know you are admitted at your Court to act in a public character by commission from the honorable Congress of the United States of America, as it gives us a prospect that, by your abilities, a more open and free commercial system will be adopted between the Kingdom of Portugal and the United States of America.

Annuities to Widow and Children of A. H. Dohrman.

It is, sir, with the utmost pleasure to myself that, as Speaker of the honorable body the Senate of my country, I have their orders to return you their grateful and warmest acknowledgments for the numberless acts of favors our citizens, as well as others of our sister States, have received from you.

I am, sir, with the highest esteem and respect, your most obedient humble servant,

ARCHIBALD CASEY,
Speaker of the Senate of Virginia.

ARNOLD HENRY DOHRMAN, Esq.

MOUNT VERNON, July 9, 1785.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of introducing Mr. Dohrman to your friendly notice and civilities. He is represented to me as a gentleman of great merit, and one who, at an early period of the war, (when our affairs were rather overshadowed,) advanced his money very liberally to support our suffering countrymen in captivity.

He has some matter to submit to Congress, which he can explain better than I. I am persuaded he will offer nothing which is inconsistent with the strictest rules of propriety, and, of course, that it will merit your patronage.

With very great esteem and regard, I am, dear sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

G. WASHINGTON.

The Hon. SAMUEL CHASE.

BY THE U. S. IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED,
Monday, October 1, 1787.

On a report of the Board of Treasury, to whom was recommended their report on the memorial of Arnold Henry Dohrman:

Resolved, That Arnold Henry Dohrman be reimbursed the sum of five thousand eight hundred and six dollars and seventy-two ninetieths of a dollar, with interest on the same from the time of expenditure, being the amount of sundry disbursements by him made for the relief of American prisoners, agreeably to vouchers examined and admitted by the proper officers of the Treasury.

And whereas the claims of the said Arnold Henry Dohrman against the United States amount to twenty thousand two hundred and seventy-seven dollars and forty ninetieths, over and above the sum of five thousand eight hundred and six dollars and seventy-two ninetieths, as above stated, in support of which various and important documents are offered, though of a nature too general to be admitted agreeably to the rules of the Treasury: and whereas this deficiency of vouchers appears to arise from the nature of the disbursements made by Mr. Dohrman, whose own house was frequently the 'asylum of whole crews of captive American seamen, who were fed, clothed, and relieved in sickness through his benevolence, and that at a time when his attachment to the cause of America was dangerous both to his person and property: and whereas Congress are disposed to acknowledge in the most honorable manner the eminent services rendered by Mr. Dohrman, and to make him further compensation:

Resolved unanimously, That the said Arnold Henry Dohrman be allowed, in consideration of his faithful and generous services as agent from the United States at the Court of Lisbon, the sum of sixteen hundred dollars per annum, and that the said salary be computed from the period at which his expenditures commenced, to the present day.

Resolved unanimously, That one complete and entire township, subject to the reservations as in the other townships, agreeably to the ordinance of the 20th May, 1785, out of the three last ranges surveyed in the Western Territory of the United States, be, and hereby is, granted to the said Arnold Henry Dohrman, free from all charges for survey; and that the said Arnold Henry Dohrman be allowed to make choice of the aforesaid township of land out of any of the said three ranges last surveyed, after the Secretary of War shall have drawn for the proportionate quantity of land assigned to the late army, agreeably to the said ordinance of the 20th May, 1785.

Resolved unanimously, That the above payments be made in such manner as the present state of the finances will best admit of, and that the same, together with the grant of land as aforesaid, be in full of Mr. Dohrman's claim against the United States.

CHARLES THOMSON,
Secretary.

STUEBENVILLE, Jan. 8, 1817.

SIR: I have seen and read the petition of Mrs. Dohrman, forwarded to you by last mail, and take the liberty of stating that I believe the facts contained therein, so far as I have had any opportunity of ascertaining them, to be true. I have, from time to time, made particular inquiries as to the value of the land which Mr. Dohrman received as a donation, and have no hesitation in saying that I consider it as the worst township in the three western ranges of this district out of which Mr. Dohrman had the right of selection. He was undoubtedly imposed on by his agent, who most probably made the selection from a mere inspection of the map, without an actual view of the land. The loss sustained by Mr. Dohrman in the selection has been gained by the United States; so that, on this ground alone, Mrs. Dohrman would appear to have a fair claim.

Whether the donation made to Mr. Dohrman, if it had been realized to its full amount, was an adequate compensation, you will be better able to decide on a view of the documents accompanying the petition. I must confess that, to me, it always appeared a very inadequate return for services so disinterested, and so far transcending the common limits of benevolence. The grant was made in the year 1787. At that time the country not being settled, the land would not have sold for fifty cents per acre. If, as I believe it was, the expenditure was made more than eight years before that time, the land, at the time of the grant, would not have sold for the interest of the sum actually advanced by Mr. Dohrman, and acknowledged by Congress to be justly due. It will be recollected that the adjoining lands were not offered for sale for thirteen years afterwards, viz: in 1800, when this office opened, and few sales were made so far west as Mr. Dohrman's township for several years after that period. It is probable, therefore, that no sale could have been effected prior to 1800; and I am convinced that neither at that time, nor at any period since the grant, could the township granted to Mr. Dohrman have been sold for the interest which would at the same period have been due on the sum expended by him, if I am correct as to the date of that expenditure. I do not believe it would now sell for half that amount, and I am well assured that it did not, in fact, produce half that amount to Mr. Dohrman.

On every view, then, that I can take of the subject, considered merely as a money transaction, the compensation appears to have been very inadequate. But, on this occasion, it is to be hoped that a great and generous people will not confine themselves to a mere counting-house cent and dime calculation of debit and credit. By what scale can you measure the benevolence of heart that prompted to such generous disinterested humanity as Mr. Dohrman evinced towards our suffering countrymen! By what rule can you estimate the wounded sensibilities of a generous and cultivated mind, reduced from affluence, from having the power of dispensing bounty and relieving distress, to a state of dependence and want—to need, though he disdained to ask, that charity which he had, in better days, been so prompt to bestow.

Mr. Dohrman, sir, died two doors from me, literally of a broken heart, without one ray of hope, as to this world, to cheer the gloom, but what arose from the expectation that this his adopted country, whose friend he had been in her peril and distress, would not, in her day of prosperity, abandon his now helpless family.

I indulge the hope that Mrs. Dohrman's petition will meet a favorable reception; and that we may not see in our streets, earning a scanty subsistence by the labor of their hands, friendless and uneducated, the children of this early and warm friend of our country, whose heart, whose house, and whose purse were so promptly and kindly opened to our distressed and suffering countrymen.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

DAVID HOGG.

P. S. I will thank you to communicate this, or the substance of it to Mr. Morrow. I would have written to him also, but that I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with him.

D. H.

HON. BENJAMIN RUGGLES,
Washington City.

PITTSBURG, Jan. 13, 1817.

DEAR SIR: A petition will be presented to Congress this session by the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, stating their present distressed condition, and praying relief in some shape from Congress.

Mr. Dohrman's meritorious claims were considered and settled by the old Congress on the 1st of October, 1787, as appears by the Journals of that date. You were then a member, and may recollect Mr. Dohrman, who lived long in the city of New York, where his dwelling was twice destroyed by fire. Owing to these and other misfortunes, he was obliged to abandon mercantile pursuits; and, as a last resource, he removed to the Western country, in the hope that he might derive subsistence for his family from the township allotted to him in the seven ranges by the resolution of Congress. Antecedent to his removal hither, he was obliged to mortgage his township to some of his creditors in New York, and this disabled him from making the best of it by subdivision or improvement.

He was in deplorable embarrassment when he reached this place, and, on examination, I found that he had unfortunately selected one of the worst townships in all the ranges, having been misled by the information of a surveyor who traced two outlines of it, where the land happened to be good, but who never had examined the land of the interior. Indeed, at that time the country was little known even to the surveyors, who were obliged to employ guards to protect them against the savages, while they marked the boundaries of the townships, without exploring any of the lands further than this operation required. The whole of his township is hilly, broken with gullies, remote from settlement or improvement, and would not now command $10,000 at a public sale; whereas, had he been well informed, he might have taken one that would now produce $100,000. He did, however, accept what was offered, on the best advice he could obtain, because he could get nothing else from Congress, who were destitute of funds to reimburse his advances. He accepted it, believing that he was taking the best land, which Congress evidently intended should be the best, but which by mistake happened to be among the worst.

He removed from this place to Steubenville, that he might live at less expense, and be nearer to his lands. His large family (chiefly females) was managed and sustained with an economy and frugality beyond anything I ever witnessed; yet in the end his avails from the lands were exhausted, and all credit at an end, although his situation was among the best he could have chosen; for the society in which he had become resident were kind and liberal to him, and have continued their beneficence to his helpless family.

As he had numerous documents and letters showing the high opinion entertained of him by many in the old Government who are still living and in public stations, he was advised to go in person to the City of Washington, and make his condition known, in the hope that as he, in the days of his prosperity and our distress, had never permitted one of our captive seamen to suffer, but his house had been their hospital and their home, we, in our turn, would extend to him a helping hand, to redeem him from the calamities that had overwhelmed him. He prepared to take this journey, and was furnished with means for his expenses, but he sickened and died before the season allotted for leaving home.

Although he did not live to solicit relief, yet it is earnestly hoped that his family may not be forgotten. Provision may be made for them without furnishing any dangerous precedent. Their case is such as can have no parallel. Lands offered and accepted, the value of which was unknown and could not be ascertained on account of danger from a public enemy; bad land taken, where good land was intended by Congress, the grantee a stranger, never in the Western country; his services great, his subsequent misfortunes, the helpless state of his family—all combine to justify an indemnity for this mistake, either in money, or, what would appear more specific, a grant of land to trustees, with power to sell on such credits, in such portions, and by such subdivisions as they may think advisable, for the support of the family and education of the children; the accounts of the trustees to be submitted to the court of Jefferson county, Ohio, and approved by them; the court to have full power to fill up vacancies occasioned by death of trustees, &c., and to compel a faithful execution of the trust as in other cases.

I am persuaded you will cheerfully co-operate in promoting any proper measure for the attainment of relief for this truly wretched family, now dependent altogether on the liberality of our country; and, if you see no fatal objection to their claim, let me ask for them not only your good offices in explaining their case to the Senate, but that you would also take the trouble of communicating to Mr. Hopkinson and Mr. J. Wilson of the House of Representatives all that you may deem useful towards forwarding the measures that may be adopted for their benefit; they will, I am sure, be ready to assist in all that ought to be granted.

Having an intimate knowledge of all Mr. Dohrman's affairs, ever since he came to the Western country, I can speak with certainty of the correctness of all that I have stated; and I will only add, that I have never known a family more forlorn and helpless, without any blame upon their own management of the means in their hands.

I have entreated your assistance in this charitable business the more readily as it affords me the opportunity of presenting myself again to your recollection, as well as of assuring you that I remain with the highest respect and esteem, dear sir, your faithful friend, and most obedient servant,

JAMES ROSS.

HON. RUFUS KING.

An Act for the relief of the widow and children of Arnold Henry Dohrman, deceased.

Approved, March 3, 1817.

LOSSES SUSTAINED DURING THE REVOLUTION.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 31, 1817.]

The committee to whom was referred the petition in behalf of the representatives of Francis Cazeau, reported:

That the claim is founded on losses sustained during the American Revolution; and as the history of the circumstances are considered necessary to a right understanding of the merits of the case, the committee offer this as an apology for the report being more than usually long.

Francis Cazeau, a native of France, and late a merchant at Montreal, served in the war of 1756 in Canada, under Generals Montcalm, De Levi, and De Lusignan, and returned to France in the latter part of the year 1763, where he was presented to, and had several conferences with, Monsieur de Choiseul, then Minister for Foreign Losses sustained during the Revolution.

Affairs at Versailles, in which that Minister gave him to understand that France had yielded to necessity in the late cession of Canada to Great Britain, and would seize the first opportunity that presented of recovering the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland; that with this view the Minister encouraged the said Cazeau to return to his usual residence and commercial pursuits at Montreal, in order that he might serve and promote the French cause and interest in the said provinces, by keeping up the attachment of the Canadians to their late Sovereign, the King of France, and by preserving a good understanding with the different Indian tribes. Soon after this, Mr. Cazeau returned to Montreal, where he extensively carried into effect the wishes of Monsieur de Choiseul.

In the year 1774, after some disturbance had taken place in Boston, Mr. Cazeau received a message from M. de Vergennes, French Minister for Foreign Affairs, by the hands of two messengers despatched to him at Montreal for that purpose. The object of this mission was to renew the request and instructions before given by M. de Choiseul, and to solicit Mr. Cazeau's aid in behalf of the American revolutionists; assuring him that the cause of the revolutionists was united with that of France, and would speedily receive her vigorous and cordial support. That, in the year 1775, a man by the name of Walker, authorized by Congress, then sitting in Philadelphia, delivered into the hands of Mr. Cazeau a letter addressed to the people of Canada by the American Congress; and the said Walker requested Mr. Cazeau to give this letter a speedy and extensive circulation in Canada, to promote the cause which Congress had undertaken.

In the following November of the same year, (1775,) Edward Antill, afterwards colonel of the Canadian regiment commanded by General Hazen, delivered to Mr. Cazeau the original of another letter addressed by General Washington, then commander-in-chief of the American forces, to the people of the province of Canada, which Colonel Antill requested him to circulate in like manner.

In the beginning of the year 1776, Mr. Cazeau received a third letter addressed to the people of Canada by the American Congress, for the purpose of being circulated in the same manner as before; which three letters were all distributed and made public by Mr. Cazeau as requested, and it is believed were productive of much good. It was also in November, 1775, that Generals Montgomery and Wooster, a few days after entering Montreal, applied to and solicited Mr. Cazeau, in the strongest and most pressing manner, in the name and by the express authority of the American Congress, to serve the cause of the revolted colonies, (now the United States,) through his interest and influence in Canada, assuring Mr. Cazeau at the same time, in the name of Congress, that he should receive full and adequate compensation for any dangers, losses, and injuries he might incur from so doing.

In November, 1778, Count d'Estaing, commander of the naval forces of France, then lately arrived at Boston, deputed Father Germain, an ex-Jesuit, to present to Mr. Cazeau a proclamation, in the name of the King of France, to his former subjects in Canada, with a request that he would give it publicity, and informed him at the same time that his conduct had received the fullest approbation of the French Ministry; and repeated to Mr. Cazeau the assurance that the cause of the United States and France was the same; and that the King of France would guaranty any claims he might have upon the United States, in consequence of services rendered, or for those that he might hereafter perform.

Mr. Cazeau, though transferred with his property at Montreal, by the peace of 1703, to the British crown, still retained all his attachments to his native country, her monarch, and her interests; and, preferring the common cause of the United States and France to that of Great Britain; and urged on to act by the united solicitations of both Powers, notwithstanding the splendid hopes and rich allurements held out to him by Sir Guy Carleton, the British Governor of Canada, embarked his life and fortune in the cause of revolted America, which he faithfully served and eminently promoted.

In order that your committee may give a more comprehensive view of the manner in which Mr. Cazeau has thus served and promoted the cause of their country, they beg leave to make some selections from statements under oath, which they pray may be considered as part of their report.

In the year 1775, when Mr. Cazeau had distributed abroad the invitation of Congress to the people of Canada, he made use of his agents in the fur trade to promote dispositions favorable to the cause of America among a great number of tribes of Indians, with whom he had an extensive commercial intercourse; and he caused the Indians to dissemble with the British Governor of Canada, who, unsuspecting of the stratagem, stripped the province of his regular troops, and thus facilitated the entry of Major Brown into Canada, where he met at every place with assistance and friends, and took possession of several posts.

The reinforcement under General Montgomery, expected in the latter part of this year, and which, destitute of every necessary provision, was supplied by Mr. Cazeau, enabled him to take possession of a flotilla of Carleton's, in the river St. Lawrence, by which he entered Montreal in November of this year.

The letter of General Washington, addressed to the Canadas, being circulated by the emissaries of Mr. Cazeau, he strengthened the partisans of Congress in that quarter by gaining over the irresolute, and by engaging numbers of the inhabitants to join under the banners of Montgomery, offering, as an inducement, to many, entire absolution from the debts they owed him, and to others gave such necessary provisions and comforts as their necessities required. Of these the General formed three bodies of troops, and assigned the commands to Colonels Livingston, Dugan, and Hazen, who served with great zeal during the war. And these sacrifices do not form an item in the present claim, as they never were estimated or presented.

In 1776, in addition to the service rendered by the circulation of exhortations of Congress to the people of Canada, Mr. Cazeau procured intelligence to be given to Generals Wooster and Arnold, which disconcerted the plans of General Carleton when he considered the success of his troops most certain; and, during the blockade of Quebec, Beaujeu, the emissary of General Carleton, was prevented, by the interference of Mr. Cazeau, from recruiting at Montreal and other places, by which the blockade was continued till the Spring, when eight thousand troops, under the command of General Burgoyne, came to their relief, and the capture of the post of Cedars by the American troops was facilitated through the influence of Mr. Cazeau, who prevented the inhabitants of the province from joining Captain Moore.

In 1777, new offers were made to Mr. Cazeau by General Sir Guy Carleton to win him over to the interest of Great Britain, which he again refused, and retaliated on the General by gaining over the emissaries and spies of the British party, by means of whom he unravelled the plans of their campaign, and frustrated the contemplated junction of the two armies of Clinton and Burgoyne. He contrived that the Americans should have intelligence twenty-four hours before the British of every order with which they procured emissaries should be charged; and by this means Colonels Solinger and Sir John Johnson were routed on Lake Ontario—an event which led the way for the celebrated victory of General Gates at Saratoga, that gave so decided a character to the hopes of the Revolution.

It was owing to the fortunate intelligence given in 1778 by Mr. Cazeau to Generals Schuyler and —, that the capture of General Rochambeau in Rhode Island, with four thousand five hundred men, was prevented, as Admiral Howe was upon the point of landing ten thousand troops, by whom they would have been surrounded; and the surrender of Fort Mifflin to the troops of Congress, which had been negotiated between him and a British officer of distinction, would have been effected, if an American officer had arrived at the time appointed.

In the year 1779, entertaining still the hope that the promised American troops would arrive, Mr. Cazeau renewed his plans against Fort Mifflin, and, in concert with the British officer before mentioned, he sent off in July an Annoyote Indian with a letter containing the necessary information as to the state of things, and requesting troops to be immediately despatched into Canada. The failure in the execution of this plan, and the loss of this most favorable opportunity of aiding the cause of America, can, in the opinion of Mr. Cazeau, be only ascribed to the disaffection of General Arnold, of which at that time he was wholly unconscious.

Understanding in the year 1780 that the town of Quebec had not more ammunition than would be equal to a siege of ten days, and that it was as ill furnished with provisions, without any hope of supply for some time, and that there were only about four thousand five hundred troops dispersed throughout the whole extent of the country, a Mr. Kenay was sent off by Mr. Cazeau, express, to give this intelligence to Congress; but, unfortunately, being imprudent in the selection of his guide, they were discovered, and this detection caused the imprisonment of Mr. Cazeau, who, still intent upon his object, though in prison, found means to send off one Mynor, another express, to carry a duplicate to Congress of the same intelligence that had been confided to Kenay; but the treachery of Arnold rendered abortive almost every plan that could be devised.

Though confined in prison, for nearly two years and a half, the devotion of Mr. Cazeau to the cause of America was not lessened; and the resources of his intelligent mind were perpetually furnishing aid even in this situation. During the period of imprisonment, he gained over to his interest the spies of the British Governor, and obtained from them every message they were charged with; and he procured the escape of numerous prisoners (both French and Americans) at different intervals of time, by whom he forwarded to Congress, or to the American commanders, whatever important intelligence he procured from the British spies.

Informed that a body of troops was forming at Albany under the command of the Marquis de Lafayette, for the purpose of entering into Canada, though still confined to his prison, Mr. Cazeau arranged a plan, with the before-named British officer who had undertaken to surrender Fort Mifflin, to put the British forces between two fires, and to surrender their General in case of a general action; and also to deliver up in the night one of the gates of Quebec if any American troops should present themselves before it.

Worn out with expectation, and disappointed in every scheme to procure the admission of troops into Canada, Mr. Cazeau made another and last attempt, through Mr. Rey, (a French officer,) whom he deputed to Congress for that purpose, and, though still unsuccessful, he had the satisfaction to learn that there was a coincidence of plan between him and General Washington, inasmuch as the General had, with equal earnestness, though with similar want of success, solicited both Congress and the French Minister that the troops commanded by Count Rochambeau should be sent into Canada. Reduced to the last extremity, and finding that his presence in Canada could no longer, under existing prospects, be useful to the common cause of the United States and France, Mr. Cazeau effected his escape from prison, and took with him his son, Colonel Gordon, and six other prisoners, and made his way into the United States.

During the period of his captivity, from 15th April, 1780, to 23d August, 1782, Mr. Cazeau was eminently serviceable, both by the correspondence which he carried on, as well as by effecting the escape of American and French prisoners, which he did to the amount of more than 150 persons, a great portion of whom were officers, and for whom he furnished the necessary equipments, provisions, and guides to enable them to get off.

It appears that Mr. Cazeau was appointed to the rank of colonel by General Montgomery, at Montreal, in November, 1775. But, by an express agreement and understanding between them, his name was not inscribed on the list of American officers, as that would have exposed his safety, inasmuch as it was necessary that he should live among the enemy, and would have put it out of his power to render those services that were expected from him.

From the evidence laid before your committee, they believe that Mr. Cazeau was a man of very large fortune at the commencement of the American Revolution, which was certainly sacrificed in consequence of his adherence to that cause, as what was not consumed by him in the service of America was confiscated and lost upon his retiring into the United States. He escaped with his son from prison, and came into the United States destitute of everything, reduced from affluence to poverty, and stood before the American people, to whose emancipation he had been greatly instrumental, a suppliant for justice—claiming from the Government a mere indemnity for pecuniary losses incurred at their instance and in their behalf, and generously making them a gift of what was more valuable than money, viz., his toils, his perils, and his sufferings.

It appears, from evidence of the most respectable kind, that Mr. Cazeau was a man of perfect integrity, and worthy of all confidence; and that no doubt can exist but that he did render all the services here set forth.

Nothing is better calculated to show the generous and disinterested sentiment which directed him to espouse the cause of America, as well as to prove the importance of his influence, than a consideration of the magnificent offers that were made him by the British Governor of Canada to draw him over to that interest. He was offered by the British Governor, in 1775, a grant of fifty-two square leagues of valuable land, containing, by estimate, about 366,912 acres. He was offered the general supply of the British army, the command of such a body of troops as he could raise, together with the commission of a brigadier general; and such was the eagerness to make the grant, that Mr. Jenkin Williams, judge of the court of common pleas and register of the secretaryship of Quebec, had been caused to sign a request for that grant, the record of which was actually made at the office.

The petition of Mr. Cazeau having been first presented to the Congress in 1783, a strong impression appears to have been entertained in that body favorable both to the merits of the claim and the worthiness of the petitioner, as they not only showed a disposition to settle and allow the claim, but seemed to have entertained the idea of granting him the island of Michilimackinac, as an additional compensation for his services. This last intention was frustrated by the retention of the post of Michilimackinac after the peace of 1783, and a small advance of money was made as an earnest of the first.

In the year 1784 the subject was again brought before Congress, and a committee, consisting of Colonel Monroe, Mr. Howell, and Mr. Sherman, made the following report, which the committee beg may be received as a part of their report:

BY THE U. S. ASSEMBLED IN CONGRESS,
March 18, 1784.

Resolved, That as the depreciation of paper currency (mentioned in Mr. Cazeau's memorial) did not arise from a voluntary act of Congress, but was an evil forced upon us by our exigencies, hath been injurious to our own citizens as well as to foreigners, and as no compensation hath been made the former for the losses they have sustained thereby, the United States in Congress assembled cannot, with justice, discriminate between them and any other class or description of men.

Resolved, That whatever stores or provisions Mr. Cazeau purchased and collected for the use of the American Army, by engagement of the officer commanding the detachment, or other person duly authorized by him for that purpose, whether they reached the detachment or not, if so purchased and collected, they were destroyed, and he in that degree injured, the United States are in honor and justice bound strictly to make good the loss he sustained thereby, provided it shall not appear, in the liquidation of his accounts, that the said stores and provisions were to have been at his risk until the delivery thereof.

Resolved, That whatever Mr. Cazeau advanced to express, to give necessary communications to our generals, should be repaid him.

Resolved, That the sale of his goods to the inhabitants of his province, to promote our interest upon cheaper terms than he might otherwise have obtained, was an act of benevolence not authorized on our part, and can, therefore, in justice, give him no claim for retribution.

Resolved, That an interest of six per cent. per annum, from the 1st day of May, 1777, be allowed to Mr. Cazeau on the above advances, and on the amount of the articles so purchased and collected.

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Finance be, and he is hereby, directed to advance to Mr. Cazeau the sum of $5,000 on account, and to order his account to be adjusted, and to give him certificates for the payment of the balance at such early and convenient times as the finances of the United States will admit of.

Resolved, That, in settling the accounts of Mr. Cazeau, his own testimony, under oath, be admitted in support of such other evidences as the circumstances of the case will admit.

Resolved, That the commissioners for settling the accounts of the State of New York with the United States be authorized and directed to examine the accounts of such Canadian refugees as have furnished the late armies of these States with any sort of supplies, and report thereon to Congress.

Copy of the affirmation of Mr. Cazeau.

ALBANY, July 24, 1785.

I, Francis Cazeau, do swear solemnly that, in the year 1776, I made a verbal agreement with General Arnold, commanding the American troops in Canada, to furnish to said troops certain articles of provisions and ammunition, for which the current prices in said province were to be paid to me, together with all the expenses attending the collection of them in convenient depositories, and in sending them to the Army, besides a commission of five per cent. on the total sum. At the same time, General Arnold agreed to indemnify me for all inevitable losses or capture, from the time the provisions should be collected to that of their delivery; that, conformably to the said agreement, a quantity was collected by my direction, of which the wheat, mentioned in the first article of the account, was entirely destroyed and lost; that the provisions of the second article, having been procured and sent in the same manner, have been plundered and entirely destroyed, with the boats; and that the prices and expenses set in the present account are not above those current at that time and place. I declare, besides, that the account passed in conformity with the agreement is just, without fraud towards the United States; and that I have not received either payment or compensation but what is carried to the credit of the present account.

FRANCIS CAZEAU.

WM. BARBER, Commissioner, &c.

Revisal of the above account by William Barber, Commissioner appointed by a resolve of Congress of the 27th June, 1785.

ALBANY, July 27, 1785.

SIR: The United States in Congress, by their resolve of the 27th June last, have been pleased to give me the power of examining the accounts of those Canadian refugees who have furnished the armies of these States with provisions of any kind, and to make report to Congress. I have examined the claim of Mr. Francis Cazeau, and have the honor, through your Excellency, to report that, as Congress, by a resolve of the 18th March, 1784, thought proper to order that Mr. Cazeau's own testimony, under oath, should be allowed in support of all other evidences which the circumstances of his case required, I have therefore taken it, (such as is annexed to this,) by which it would appear that, by an agreement entered into between Mr. Cazeau and General Arnold, all provisions and munitions furnished by virtue of the said agreement were to be at the risk of the United States up to the delivery; and, by other concurrent testimony, the quantity charged in his account was bona fide procured with the intention of aiding our army; and that the said provisions and munitions were inevitably lost and destroyed before they were demanded and had arrived to our troops.

It would appear, also, as well by the testimony of Mr. Cazeau, as by a comparison of the price of wheat in those States, that the prices charged are not above the prices current at that time; therefore, conformably to the last act of Congress above mentioned, which has laid down the principles by which the present account is to be governed, it would clearly appear, and I am entirely of the opinion, that the sums charged for the wheat, the three boats, the provisions, and advances to gain intelligence, are just; that the United States owe to Mr. Cazeau the sum of $8,000 on account of the first article, and $4,000 on account of the second; and that the United States owe also to Mr. Cazeau, for advances made at different times to procure intelligence, the sum of $276 64, and for advances made for the use of the troops of the United States. As to that which relates to the expense of transportation of the aforesaid provisions, and the commission on the purchase, although it appears, by the testimony of Mr. Cazeau, that these allowances should be made, yet I presume that a special act of Congress is necessary to confirm this part of the agreement before any sum be placed to his credit on that account. I am, at the same time, of the opinion that the ordinary commission ought at least to be allowed to Mr. Cazeau on the amount of his purchases, together with a compensation for the extraordinary expenses which he had to incur in procuring and forwarding the provisions, as well as the expenses which he has incurred in obtaining a settlement of his account.

I am your Excellency's very obedient servant,

WILLIAM BARBER,

Commissioner of Accounts, N. Y.

His Exc'y the PRESIDENT of Congress.

The amount thus settled on account, by order of Congress, falling far short of what Mr. Cazeau thought he had a right to claim, as he entered into the service of the United States at the beginning of the Revolution with an estate worth more than three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and came out of the war in penury and distress, he declined accepting the amount liquidated by Mr. Barber, Commissioner of Accounts for the State of New York, not understanding the same to be on account, but in lieu and in full satisfaction of his more ample claim.

Emboldened as he was to risk everything, by the solicitations of the American Congress, who, together with the Government of France, were pledged to the amount of whatever losses he might sustain; and buoyed up for a time by the flattering prospects that were presented to him, before the fervor of gratitude for his aid had subsided, it is not wonderful that, when wearied down with the pursuit of his just claim, and sinking with despair, he should have given expression to his feelings in the following pathetic style, viz; "The favorable disposition that was shown towards me at that period (1783) by the Legislature of the United States, and the liberal concessions of land which were announced by several* members of Congress as being intended to be made to me as an indemnity spontaneously granted by national munificence, had rendered me extremely moderate and reserved in all my demands relative to the determined objects of my account, and also in the several valuations, which seemed in some measure to be left to my own arbitration. But after having been kept until this day in vain expectation of the justice that was promised; after having worn out the rest of my life by twenty-four years of fruitless solicitation, attended with continual fatigue, sorrow, and the deepest misery, since a great nation has enjoyed that happy state of independence which my eminent services have contributed to establish; reduced as I am now, bordering upon my grave, to invoke only a strict and impartial justice, which, although I may never enjoy the effect of it, my creditors, my benefactors, and my children may partake in, I cannot dispense with stating each particular object of my loss at its fair value at the time when I was dispossessed of my property."

Mr. J. B. Stuart, the authorized petitioner in behalf of the family of Mr. Cazeau, and his assignee, was in London in March last, (1816,) in quality of Chancellor of the United States Consulate at that place, when his claim was presented to Mr. Adams, the American Minister at that Court, and who was at the same time informed that Francis Cazeau was then dead, leaving a wife and children in Paris in total poverty, who were then, and for eighteen years before had been, subsisting on the benevolence and charity of a Mr. Corbeaux, the brother-in-law of Cazeau, who was himself in rather indigent circumstances, and to whom Cazeau, in his lifetime, as a retribution for his generous support of himself and family, had made an assignment of part of his claim, and a power for the recovery of the whole; that Mr. Cazeau's advanced stage of life (being upwards of ninety years of age when he died) prevented him from crossing the Atlantic to prosecute the claim.

Mr. Adams referred the business to the Consul, for him to put it into the hands of some fit person, to be presented to Congress; and the petitioner was selected as that agent.

This claim has been revived, from time to time, as far as it was in the power of Mr. Cazeau to revive it, as your committee are induced to believe that it has been regularly presented to the attention of every American Minister at the Court of France since the Revolution.

From a view of all the circumstances attending this case, and a thorough and patient investigation of the voluminous documents and memoir presented with this claim, a brief sketch of which is here presented to the Senate, the committee are of opinion that Francis Cazeau was a meritorious and useful friend to the cause of the American Revolution; that he consumed much of his property to aid the establishment of our independence; and that his firm adherence to the United States in that arduous struggle was the cause of his being reduced from the greatest affluence to the extremest poverty. They are further of opinion that Mr. Cazeau was solicited by the old Congress, and by their authorized agents and officers, to give his aid and influence in their favor, and that he was promised by the then ruling powers of the country, and was by them impressed with a full conviction, that whatever pecuniary losses he might sustain in their service should be reimbursed, and that the Government of France guaranteed the indemnity.

Your committee do not consider themselves authorized to allow the claim to the great extent in which it has been stated by Mr. Cazeau, as they are not sure that it would be proper to allow some of the items charged; but they have no hesitation in saying that, in their opinion, the claim ought to be allowed to at least the amount stated by Mr. Barber in July, 1785, under the sanction of Congress in 1784 and 1785, together with interest from that time. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to report a bill authorizing the payment of forty-two thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-seven cents to the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal, or to his assignee or attorney, or other person lawfully constituted and empowered to receive the same.

Commissariat for the Army.

A COMMISSARIAT.

WASHINGTON Dec. 16, 1816.

SIR: In reply to your communications relative to the supply of rations to the Army, I have the honor to state—

1st. I have not a doubt but a well organized Commissariat would insure a safer, a cheaper, and in every respect a better supply than the present system of contract; nor have I heard of a doubt upon the subject, excepting only, as to the expense.

Upon this point it may be remarked, that most of the contractors have made very handsome profits, and many of them indeed great fortunes, under contracts apparently reasonable.

Contractors are in the habit of employing an agent for each post, and in some cases confiding to sub-contractors the supply of particular departments or posts.

It is not likely that a man of business, who is honest and discreet, would bid off the contract without a pretty certain prospect of profit.

Could the Government find no man to place at the head of the Commissariat, as well qualified to superintend the supply of rations, as one of the late contractors, or none equal in honesty, industry, and capacity, to the late agents of the rich contractors; in this case the contract system should be preferred.

If a contractor can make a clear profit, the public, by the Commissariat, may do so likewise, and, therefore, the latter will be the cheaper mode of supply.

The public would, in this case, save the exact amount which, under the contract system, would fall into the hand of contractors. But even, supposing the contract to be bid off at too low a rate, to enable the contractor to make any clear profit; supposing the contractor to be actuated alone, in the supply of rations to the troops, by the purest patriotism, without the prospect of making money, still the Commissariat would be preferable; because, a contractor, having no possible prospect of making money, would be constantly embarrassed with the apprehension of losing money—and in every purchase he would see before him the wretched alternative of selecting the cheapest, and consequently the worst provisions, or being involved in bankruptcy and ruin.

The choice of these evils can readily be imagined. It is a choice, as most officers who have had separate commands, can testify, that has imposed upon our troops the cheapest and coarsest provisions; and which have, on many occasions, been so much damaged as to sicken and kill hundreds of our men.

Upon this subject, I beg leave to call the attention of your honorable committee to the official reports and returns of the Army, stationed at French Mills, in the Autumn and Winter of 1813, to February 1814; by which it will be seen that out of about — men — were sick at once, and that from the 18th November to the 1st February, there were — deaths; and I feel warranted by the reports of the medical staff, particularly those of Doctors Ross, Lovel, and Woodbury, as well as by my own observation, in saying, that for the most part the diseases and deaths at that place proceeded from the damaged provisions which the troops were compelled to eat, or to eat nothing.

The suffering of the troops, from a similar cause, at many other places, during the war, were not much less severe than at French Mills; insomuch, that I have not a doubt that we have lost more men by disease, contracted principally in the use of bad provisions, than we have lost by the fire of the enemy. Besides, the military system which comprehends individuals not subject to military law, and under positive control of the commanding officer of an army, is radically defective, and calculated to paralyze a military body. An army, immediately dependent upon any other, except the single military head, is a monster; and although its native prowess may often force it, with all its deformities to victory; yet, to make victory more sure, the immediate military head should command the whole strength and resources immediately connected with the army under him.

The supply of rations is vitally important to the very existence of an army; it is infinitely more so than the supply of clothing, of pay, or even of arms or ammunition.

An army could, by sudden changes of position, preserve itself for weeks or months without the latter, but the most patriotic band could not be kept together for more than a few days without rations. Should any officer of the Ordnance department attempt to palm upon the Army damaged powder or even damaged flints, surely no man could doubt the propriety of prompt military punishment for such an offence; and yet, under the present system, damaged rations have been forced upon the troops, and many of them thereby sickened and killed, without any remedy being provided against contractors, save only the miserable farce of an action upon the case.

It is true, under the contract system, damaged provisions may be refused and destroyed, and the General may order the Quartermaster, upon the failure of the contractor, to purchase the proper supplies.

These regulations look very well indeed upon paper. They seem to afford reasonable security against the evils which they were intended to obviate. But what are they in practice?

The General requires the contractor to furnish twenty days' complete rations for ten thousand men, at a given point upon the frontier. The contractor reports the supply deposited at the place and time appointed. The army arrives near the enemy; every officer and every man is necessarily occupied in preparing for action. In the mean time, it is found, in reviewing the provisions, that a great portion of them are damaged. The inspection takes place, and the provisions are condemned, and the army left destitute.

The General will probably be compelled either to make a premature effort to bring on an action, be beaten, or make a disgraceful retreat, or he must endeavor to subsist his army upon damaged rations. The troops are dispirited, sickened, and many of them desert—and yet, the contractor is screened from military punishment. He abandons his contract whenever he finds it to be unproductive of gain. The Quartermaster is then compelled to leave his regular duties, and, without due time, or any previous arrangements, to avail himself of the best markets, and in a country where little can be got at any price, he is obliged to purchase such supplies as the country will at once afford, and is often compelled to give any price which a knowledge of the pressing calls of the service may induce the avaricious seller to demand.

2d. The organization of the Commissariat should be as follows:

The chief should have the rank, pay and emoluments of the Adjutant and Inspector General, and be stationed at the Seat of Government. Next to the chief there should be attached, to each division of the Army, a Commissary General, with the rank, pay, and emolument of the Adjutant General; also, an assistant for each department, with the rank, pay, and emolument of an Assistant Adjutant General, and for each post an issuing commissary, with the rank, pay, and emolument of a lieutenant.

Candidates for the appointments should be required to exhibit to the Department of War proper evidence of character and qualifications, and be appointed and commissioned in the same manner, and take the same oath, as officers of the line of the army, and enter into bond, with approved security, for the faithful performance of their duties.

The rank of these officers should in no case entitle them to command in the line, except when specially ordered thereto by the commanding General. Rank, however, should be given them, because without it they would often be subject to the embarrassing control of young inexperienced officers, and would fail to command, in the lower grades of the Army, that respect which rank is necessary to produce.

The chief of the Commissariat should have the control of the officers and other persons employed in the department. And, under the direction of the War Department, should superintend the purchase and supply of rations, &c.

It should be the duty of the Commissaries of divisions and departments to make all purchases of the component parts of rations, and forward the same to such place and in such quantities for issue as the general or officer commanding the departments may direct, respectively, and to make unexpected visits to the different posts, inspect the provisions, and regulate the issues, the accounts and abstracts.

The purchasing as well as the issuing Commissaries to be required to make monthly as well as quarterly statements of the amount of cash received and expended, the quantity of provisions purchased, and the quantity issued since last return, as well as the quantity and quality of the provisions on hand. These statements to be certified upon honor, and forwarded to the chief of the department, and a duplicate thereof sent to the general or public officer commanding. They will, moreover, be required to render quarterly accounts in such form as may be prescribed by the War Department.

In this way the state of the supplies and accounts of each officer of the Commissariat will be distinctly understood monthly, and quarterly, by the chief of the department; who, possessing the power to arrest or suspend any delinquent, would prevent or promptly detect every irregularity. But the most effectual check will be found in the general officers commanding divisions, departments, and principal posts, who, in addition to the power to arrest and try officers, should be authorized to receive from them all public moneys, and supply the place of such delinquent officers by temporary appointments until the casual vacancies should be filled.

It is the duty of the inspector, to inspect the troops and supplies of each post and corps, once in two months—in addition to this he may be instructed to inspect the provisions, particularly as to quality and quantity, and compare the same with the monthly report of the Commissariat, and in all cases of neglect or omission on the part of such Commissary, he will be punishable by the sentence of a general court martial.

It seems to be admitted by all that in time of war the Commissariat would be decidedly preferable to the contract system.

This I consider to be a conclusive argument in favor of the immediate adoption of the measure. If any branch of military knowledge is necessary for a state of war, its practical introduction in time of peace cannot but be proper, if it be practicable. The Commissariat particularly should be organized and put into operation in time of peace.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

EDMOND P. GAINES.

Copy of Commodore John Rodgers's letter to the Secretary of the Navy, relative to a Naval Site and Rendezvous on the waters of Chesapeake Bay.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE,

December 23, 1816.

SIR: Having, in company with the other Commissioners of the Navy Board, examined those places designated in your letter of the 7th May last, for the purpose of reporting, through you, for the consideration of the President of the United States, the opinion of the Navy Commissioners as to the means most proper to be adopted for the defence of Chesapeake Bay in time of war; it is a source of unpleasant reflection, not only to myself, but I am confident equally so to the other Commissioners, to find, on comparing our opinions, that we do not entirely agree as to the mode by which this truly important object might, most probably, be accomplished. I regret this the more from the persuasion, that it would have been more agreeable to you, and more satisfactory to the President, had we found all the data upon which we might have formed a correct estimate, of such positive character as to admit of no diversity of opinion. As, however, different opinions are entertained by the members of the board, we have judged it best that each member should make a separate report; trusting that from these conflicting opinions, and the facts and arguments adduced in support of each, the best means of obtaining the highly important object in view may be elicited.

I proceed, with respectful deference for the opinions of my brother Commissioners, to submit those views of this important question, which the most attentive consideration and anxious investigation of facts have produced in my mind.

From the distance between the nearest points of the Middle Ground and Horse-Shoe, the great depth of water between those places, and their exposed situation to the mountainous waves, rolling in from the Atlantic ocean, unobstructed, during the prevalence of south-easterly gales, I incline to the opinion that it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to erect batteries, at any cost, however great, that would resist the tumult of the whole Atlantic ocean drawn as it were to a focus, by the peculiar formation of the coast at that point.

In another view, such an attempt might be hazardous; for it may be seriously questioned, whether the erection of batteries in that part of the channel of Chesapeake Bay which is the most confined, would not produce a new channel through that immense bank of sand, the Middle Ground, thereby changing the course of its waters, rendering the batteries wholly useless, and subjecting the navigation of the bay to destruction at its very confluence with the Atlantic ocean. A new channel, thus formed, would necessarily displace immense deposits of sand from the Middle Ground, and thereby, most probably, to the destruction of the navigation, complete the bar that nature has already more than two-thirds finished, across the entrance of the bay.

For these reasons, the erection of batteries between the Horse-Shoe and Middle Ground, appears to me, if not impracticable, at least unadvisable.

I will now examine the navigation from Cape Henry to Hampton Roads, and thence to Norfolk, for the purpose of demonstrating, by unquestionable facts, how far Norfolk unites the advantages essential to the purposes of a great naval rendezvous and depot of maritime stores.

As an outer harbor, Hampton Roads is easy of ingress and egress to ships of every class. At its entrance from the bay, by erecting a formidable battery at Old Point Comfort, and another at the distance of one mile, on the shoal of Willoughby's Point, it might be so far defended as to prevent a hostile fleet, however formidable, from attempting to enter it without having in view the accomplishment of some great object. On ordinary occasions, the risk which an enemy would then incur, from an attempt to enter Hampton Roads, would no doubt be sufficient to deter him; but an object worthy of the risk might present itself—and, in such case, an enemy availing himself of the most favorable wind and tide, might attempt it, and would probably succeed. Passing these batteries, as he might do under such circumstances, with a velocity equal to fourteen miles an hour, the effect of the batteries would be rendered very uncertain, and he would be in their reach only eight minutes seventeen seconds! Should he succeed in entering the road, he might anchor in various situations, from four to four and a half miles, in every direction from the shore. My own personal observation enables me to add, that during the prevalence of the north-easterly gales, particularly in the Winter season, Hampton Roads is subject to a very heavy sea, which may be ascribed to its great width at its entrance, and its exposure to the N. E.

As an inner harbor, Norfolk may be easily defended both by land and by sea; and there is in its vicinity an abundance of good timber. These are great advantages; but, from the difficulty of getting in or out of Elizabeth river, arising from the narrowness of the channel in many places, and the various courses necessary to be steered, (from W. N. W to E. N. E. points directly opposite) before you reach Cape Henry, added to a shoal at its confluence with the waters of Hampton Roads, on which there are only twenty feet eight inches at low water, and not more than twenty-four feet two inches at high water, during the prevalence of neap-tides—and at no time, excepting the Spring-tides, more than twenty-two feet at low, and twenty-five feet at high water, present to my mind insuperable objections to Norfolk as a navy-yard, particularly when it is recollected how imperfect and insecure Hampton Roads would be as an outer harbor.

I will now proceed to state the advantages and disadvantages peculiar to York river, considered as a place for a naval rendezvous and depot of naval stores—below Yorktown as an outer, and above it as an inner harbor.

The lower part of York river being, at its mouth, only one mile wide, and three quarters in breadth, from shore to shore, and the channel only about fifteen hundred yards from flat to flat, and affording, as it does, a safe navigation at all times, and in all seasons, for ships of the greatest draught of water, is, in my opinion, suitable for an outer harbor. With the aid of land batteries, an inferior may be defended against a superior force of ships. Like Hampton Roads, however, it is subject to a rough sea during the prevalence of easterly gales; but in this river that advantage is greatly diminished by the fact, that with any wind that would make this anchorage objectionable, or that would enable an enemy of superior force to approach you, (supposing this place not to be fortified,) you can, with perfect security and ease, get under weigh and run into the inner harbor, above the batteries at Yorktown and Gloucester.

As an inner harbor and Naval Depot, York river, above Yorktown, does not combine every advantage desirable, not having any basin or deep bay in which ships could be sheltered from the draught of the river, and there not being an abundant supply of timber immediately in its vicinity.* It has, however, every other essential requisite, being completely susceptible of defence against a land or naval force, and affording at all times, and in all tides, an easy and safe navigation to ships of the greatest draught of water—there being, for at least ten miles above Yorktown, where the river is actually only nine hundred yards wide from shore to shore, nowhere less than six fathoms of water.

Another very prominent fact, in relation to the outer harbor of York, more than counterbalances the objections stated. From that harbor ships passing up and down the Chesapeake Bay, are exposed to full view; indeed, the moment a ship enters the bay, you can discover her. You would there have the advantage of watching the movements of an enemy from a safe harbor. If he comes with a force too formidable for you to resist him in that position, you can retire—the same wind that enables him to approach you, would enable you to retire to a place of safety. If circumstances would justify your attacking him, you might do so, with the advantage of having the earliest intelligence of his approach.

Hence, although York river does not possess every advantage that could be desired, as respects either its inner or outer harbor, it does, in my opinion, unite more of the essential requisites than nature has bestowed on almost any other place. From its particular situation (which the chart will show) when aided by a naval force, it is the only point deserving the name of the key to the Chesapeake Bay.

I proceed now to examine St. Mary's river.

This river is situated on the north side of the Potomac, about seven miles above Point Lookout, the next above Smith's Point, with which it forms the entrance into the Potomac. By some it is urged that this place, as respects salubrity of climate, is preferable to either Norfolk or York. As a safe and commodious harbor, it is, perhaps, not excelled by any in the United States. At its entrance it is about three miles wide, and the water is thirty-two to thirty-three feet deep; for three and a half to four miles up, its width gradually decreases, until you pass two projecting points at opposite sides, within which the depth at low water is about twenty-four feet—and the river from point to point about half a mile; from this to a place about two miles further up, the river is, by two other projecting points, diminished to about five hundred yards in width, presenting above those points a beautiful basin, in which there is, near the entrance inside, twenty or twenty-one feet at low water.

This river above, where it is perfectly susceptible of defence against a naval force, presents in several respects the most seducing reasons for its selection as a Naval Depot and rendezvous. But situated as it is, in a narrow peninsula, having the Patuxent on the one side, and the Potomac on the other, the protection of such an establishment would be attended with great expense. To protect it against a land force, it would be necessary to erect strong batteries, and the annual expense of maintaining an efficient garrison in them would be very great.

Such an establishment should not only be able to protect itself, but it should afford the means of protecting our own commerce in every part of the bay. This latter advantage, I am inclined to think, is not possessed in a superior degree by St. Mary's, owing to its great distance from the sea, (ninety-five to one hundred miles,) neither do I think that in the present infant state of our country it could effectually protect itself against a land force, since even above the line of defence, where the batteries would necessarily be situated, the peninsula is so narrow that a superior land force might so occupy it, as to cut off all communication in the rear, thereby endangering the safety of the adjacent country; while at the same time a superior naval force, from the safe anchorage afforded, might not only cut off all communication in front, by his large vessels, but his smaller vessels might destroy every merchant vessel of ours attempting to pass up to Washington or to Baltimore.

The facts stated being all that occur to me as essential in deciding that question of locating a Naval Depot and rendezvous, I now proceed respectfully to submit my views as to the best means of defending the Chesapeake Bay generally. I assume the preliminary position, which I presume will be readily accorded to me, that in the present infant state of our country, our preparations to meet a war should be conducted with a view to measures of defence, as well as offence.

Two small but strong martello towers, between the eastern extreme of Lynnhaven Bay and the mouth of Lynnhaven Creek, would prevent an enemy from anchoring between those two points; and his exclusion thence would, as you will perceive by the chart, deprive him of any other safe anchorage nearer the mouth of the bay than New Point Comfort.

A strong battery on Old Point Comfort would keep him out of Hampton Roads; and two martello towers at the mouth of York river, would prevent his anchoring in that situation, while, at the same time, they would serve to protect it, as an outer harbor and general rendezvous for our marine force assembled in the Chesapeake Bay in time of war.

* Although it would be an advantage if York river had a basin, or deep bay, to shelter ships from the draught of the river, yet its not having that advantage is not to be considered as constituting any serious objection to the river.

York river, fortified at Yorktown, would afford security to that important tract of country through which it passes, and secure a Naval Depot higher up the river. The place where I consider it advisable to locate such an establishment is called the Clay Banks, and is about ten miles higher up than Yorktown.

While a battery at Old Point Comfort, and two martello towers at the mouth of York river, would keep an enemy from Hampton and York, they would, with the aid of a suitable naval force, prevent his attempting to take shelter in a situation so near as New Point Comfort. Hence, being shut out of Lynnhaven Bay by the two towers proposed in that quarter, he would be deprived of all the safe anchorage near the entrance of the bay.

The importance of depriving an enemy of anchorage in Lynnhaven Bay, is fully established by the fact, that it is a position more dangerous to our commerce than any that could be occupied by any enemy within the Chesapeake Bay; and if the importance of depriving him of all safe anchorage near the entrance of the bay, be, as it appears to me, too obvious to admit of a doubt, then the propriety of erecting towers and batteries at the other places suggested, must necessarily be conceded.

It will, I presume, be readily admitted, in devising the most efficient means for the protection of the Chesapeake Bay, that the mouth of the bay should claim the first attention, since if you can succeed in protecting that point effectually, you afford protection to all points above it. The measures which I have had the honor of suggesting, have had this great object in view.

Allow me, sir, to request your attentive examination of the chart submitted. A reference to that part of it which embraces York Spit, and what is termed the Head of the Middle Ground, will, I think, satisfy you of the great advantage which a respectable naval force, stationed at the mouth of York river, would possess; and that such a force, co-operating with the towers near Lynnhaven Bay, the battery on Old Point Comfort, and the towers of York river, proposed, would in all probability, protect the whole commerce of the Chesapeake Bay.

With respect to the Tangier Islands, I have considered it unnecessary to say anything; particularly as the report and chart made by Captain Spence, afford more information than any personal observation of my own would enable me to communicate.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN RODGERS.

Hon. B. W. CROWNINSHIELD,
Secretary of the Navy.

N. B. Some difference of opinion probably exists, as to the practicability of defending, against a land force, a navy yard situated on the Clay Banks. I cannot, however, persuade myself to entertain any doubt upon the subject, since the land is there as high, if not higher than any other within reach of cannon shot. There are moreover two large creeks, Aberdeen and Jones's, that discharge their waters into York river, on each side of the proposed site, about one mile distant from its centre, by which, without any extraordinary labor or expense, the whole establishment might be insulated; and the measure by which this desirable protective effect would be produced, would furnish an ample supply of water for all the purposes of labor-saving machinery.

For further particulars relatively to the advantages of this place, permit me to refer you to the following extracts of Captain Sinclair's report:

"The mouths of these two creeks are two miles apart, but before they flow half a mile there are two branches approaching each other, within a quarter of a mile, where, after the creeks are dammed below, a canal might be cut which would insulate the place, and add greatly to its security in the rear. Indeed, it appears to be very capable of being defended by a moderately small force. The channel does not exceed a quarter of a mile in width, and is overlooked by an eminence of 30 feet for a mile or two below. The country is said to be healthy; indeed, judging from its inhabitants, I should pronounce it so. The land is generally fine, and well timbered with white oak, yellow and pitch pine, and some cedar, though not in abundance."

JOHN RODGERS.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE,
January 2, 1817.

SIR: In obedience to your call of the 16th ultimo, on the Navy Commissioners, requiring a report of the late examination and surveys made under their direction, in pursuance of your instructions of the 7th May, I enclose you a statement of such facts as I have been enabled to collect upon this important subject. From the diversity of opinion which we have found to exist between us upon this important subject, we have deemed it most satisfactory to give in separate reports. This diversity was, perhaps, to have been expected, in a case presenting so wide a range for observation; and I trust we shall not be considered as too tenacious of our individual opinions, when it is recollected that this question involves the safety of the Navy, and the protection of the extensive shores of the Chesapeake.

The first examination required by your order of the 7th, is to ascertain the most proper mode of defending the Chesapeake in time of war.

In giving my opinion upon this head, I beg leave to be understood as disclaiming all knowledge of the expense of constructing fortifications, for particular estimates of which I beg leave to refer you to Lieutenant Colonel Bomford, of the engineers, who accompanied us on the survey. The Chesapeake Bay can be defended from a superior hostile fleet only by fortifications sunk at some point of the channel, and the point nearest the ocean susceptible of defence, is obviously the most proper. The channel of the bay at the Capes, navigable by ships of a large class, is four miles and three-quarters wide, depth of water generally from ten to fifteen fathoms. The sea, at this point, being uninterrupted by shoals in its roll from the Atlantic, would, in my opinion, render fortifications utterly impracticable. Ascending the bay from the Capes, the channel branches at the Horse-Shoe, one branch passing into Hampton Roads, the other leading up the bay itself. That branch of the channel which leads up to Hampton Roads, passes between two shoals; that on the south side, called Willoughby's, and distant from Old Point Comfort about two miles and a quarter, has eight feet water on it; the one on the north side is called the Thimbles, and is distant from Old Point about three miles, and has nine feet water on it; they are about a geographical mile distant from each other. The other branch of the channel (that which passes up the bay) has a width between the Horse-Shoe and the Middle Ground of four miles, and the depth of water for three-fourths of this distance does not exceed four fathoms and a half, being nowhere more than eight fathoms.

The bottom, from a number of experiments, appears to be a solid and closely compacted sand, protected from the heavy sea of the Atlantic by the shoal of the Middle Ground, which stretches many miles to sea, and on which its violence is expended before it reaches this channel. If the Chesapeake be susceptible of defence at all, it is my opinion this is the only point at which it can be defended. The channel at every other place, above or below, being much wider, and of much greater depth, and that works, judiciously constructed, between the tail of the Horse-Shoe and the Middle Ground would be permanent, strong evidence is furnished by those extensive works which form the harbor of Cherbourg—works constructed on a sand, unprotected by shoals without, where the sea is as violent, the tide infinitely stronger, and its perpendicular rise upwards of forty feet.

You will perceive, sir, that, in considering the subject of defending the Chesapeake generally, I have included the defence of Hampton Roads, not only as an arm of the bay, nor on account of the objects of spoil, to which the banks of its rivers invite an enemy, but with reference to the other inquiry of a naval depot, to which I shall presently call your attention. In relation to the defence of Hampton Roads particularly—if the defence of this place were the exclusive object, there is another position for the purpose, which would probably be preferable, which is Old Point Comfort, and the opposite shoal, called the Rip Raps, which are less than one mile distant. I beg leave to refer you to the report made upon this subject by Colonel Bomford, merely noticing, "that I understand it was made out before it was discovered that the water on Willoughby's shoals and the Thimbles was so shallow, or that those shoals approached so nearly together as they do." I will now further add the authority of General Bernard's opinion, "that any distance, not exceeding one mile, may be so fortified as to be rendered impassable.

If, in addition to powerful works placed at the entrance into Hampton Roads, we add, that part of the naval force, already contemplated, which will probably be stationed within the Roads, the only inducement a hostile fleet could have to attempt passing heavy batteries, so moored as to aid in obstructing the enemy's passage, and sufficiently near to be sustained by the forts, in the event of their passing, I do not believe it will ever be attempted. Let us suppose Hampton Roads thus fortified, and our naval depot, as well as our fleet, drawn within those defences, what inducement would remain to an enemy to attempt a passage up the bay? The destruction of our fleet and our depot would be their first object; their second would be, to prevent our fleet from getting to sea: either of these objects would keep them necessarily in the vicinity of the Roads. The pillage of the shores of the Chesapeake and its waters would be the only remaining inducement for a cruise up the bay—an inducement too trifling to permit the belief that they would abandon for it the important objects that they would leave in the neighborhood of Hampton Roads; and more particularly when their passage up the bay is opposed by batteries stretched across the channel at the Horse-Shoe and Middle Ground, and with a fleet, too, in their rear, ready to act, in the event of their receiving such injury, as is more than probable they would receive, in passing such works. The non-existence of any object of sufficient importance to invite an enemy up the bay, under the arrangements already stated, would render it unnecessary to have works between the Horse-Shoe and the Middle Ground as numerous or as strong, by one half, as would be otherwise requisite. And it is my opinion, that the bay and Hampton Roads are susceptible of permanent and complete defence, by works erected at the points proposed, and the same works be made to serve for the defence of both; whereby the whole expense of fortifying the Naval Depot would be saved, as well as the expense of keeping up garrisons. What the expense of such works would be, I am incapable of saying; but I am satisfied that the cost to the nation of defending the shores of the Chesapeake, for one single war, would greatly surpass what would be requisite to erect a permanent defence of the bay; and when we connect this with the debasement of permitting the enemy to make a home of our waters, the consideration of any warrantable expenditure can scarcely be thought to oppose an obstacle to the establishment of any works which may be determined to be practicable.

I come now to the location of the Naval Depot; and, on this point, there are a few simple principles which seem decisive of the inquiry. A Naval Depot should possess a sufficiency of water; it should be contiguous to the ocean, otherwise the Navy could not render that prompt protection to the coast which comprises the greater part of its utility; it should also be connected with the means of supplies of timber and naval stores, which no posture of war could cut off or interrupt: these are qualities of the first magnitude.

There are other advantages, not indeed so indispensable, but still of a very high character, and which would be extremely fortunate to find with the qualities of primary importance already mentioned; such for example, as a populous neighborhood, from which supplies of labor and provisions might be commodiously drawn, and which would be at hand to give support to the depot in the event of a sudden attack; another of these incidental advantages, is a large, safe, and well defended outer harbor, into which the ships, when built, could be drawn and manœuvred without the hazard of exposure to a superior enemy.

Hampton Roads, which I consider the outer harbor of Norfolk, is eighteen miles from Cape Henry. Ships can enter or proceed to sea from it, with the wind from any quarter. It furnishes excellent anchorage, and has sufficient room for a fleet to manœuvre in under sail—an advantage which no other harbor, that I know of, possesses. The distance from Hampton Roads to the navy yard at Gosport is twelve miles, and the shoalest water found in the river at ordinary high tides, is twenty-five feet. This depth is more than is sufficient for the seventy-fours we now have. You will find on the file in your office that the pilotage paid for the Independence, (seventy-four,) when she sailed for the Mediterranean, was twenty-four feet. The ships now building, although of great capacity, will not draw so much, by six inches. The present defences of Norfolk are, in my opinion, sufficient to protect it from any naval force that can be brought against it.

It will be recollected, that during the late war, the enemy considered it absolutely necessary to get possession of Craney island, before they could pass up to Norfolk with their shipping; in consequence of which, a combined attack by their boats, and a considerable land force, was made on Craney island. The attack was repelled by a few pieces of cannon placed upon the sand, since which time it has been regularly fortified. All the approaches to Norfolk and the navy yard by land are interrupted by water-courses, and lead through swamps. Both places, with the exception of about two hundred yards, are insulated by creeks, unfordable by reason of the deep mud. These creeks can be, and I believe have been, connected by military works; nor is there any higher ground than that on which they stand, within cannon-range of either place. It is the opinion of military men, who have commanded there, that they are particularly well situated for defence against an attack by land.

From Craney island up to the navy yard, (which I consider the timber harbor,) is six miles, in which space thirty sail-of-the-line may lay with perfect convenience; and it is at all times so smooth as not to interrupt the ordinary work or repairs that may be required. From Norfolk to Hampton Roads, large ships cannot sail when the wind is ahead, in consequence of the narrowness of the channel; but if warping anchors, with buoys, be laid down in the channel, (as is the case in all men-of-war harbors that are close,) ships can, with any wind, be warped into the Roads.

The harbors of Malta and Port Mahon, which are considered two of the best harbors in Europe, can only be left or entered, when the wind is adverse, by warping. The navy yard at Norfolk comprises within its walls a square of about twenty acres, one side of which lays upon the channel of the river, at which sixteen sail-of-the-line can be laid up in ordinary, if they are brought to the pier, end on, as is practised at the naval arsenal at Antwerp.

The navy yard, in its present state, furnishes as many conveniences for building or fitting out as any yard in the United States—two hundred thousand dollars at least having been already expended by the public in valuable improvements. The neighborhood furnishes abundance of oak and pine timber suitable for naval purposes, and also naval stores, a supply of which cannot be cut off by a blockading enemy. The advantage it possesses in consequence of its vicinity to a commercial city would be considerable, both as it regards the numerous mechanics and seamen that are to be obtained there, and the protection a large population would afford, in the event of a sudden attack. The climate of Norfolk is, I presume, similar to that of the shores of the Chesapeake generally on tide water.

I will now proceed to the examination of York river. From Cape Henry light-house to Gloucester town, which is the first point on York river that could be rendered sufficiently strong to prevent the passage of a hostile fleet, is thirty-two miles. Ships can enter or proceed to sea from it with all winds. The distance from Gloucester to the Clay Banks, the place contemplated for the Navy Yard, is seven miles, and the depth of water is sufficient for any ship at all times of tide. It can unquestionably be defended against any attack by water. It is at present entirely unprotected by any fortifications. From the best information I have been enabled to collect, I am induced to believe that there are several rivers putting in from the Bay navigable for light craft and boats, and approaching within eight or nine miles of the Clay Banks, where a debarkation of troops might be effected. Of the nature of the intervening grounds I am unacquainted. The site selected as the best in this river for a Naval Depot forms at present part of the bed of the river, and no vessel drawing ten feet water can approach the bank nearer than a quarter of a mile. As the bottom is mud, it is probable that it will be found necessary to drive piles for the foundation of the Navy Yard, and the whole yard must of course be composed of artificial or made ground. There is a creek on each side of its heading, about half a mile in the rear, where they approach within about four hundred yards: at this point it is proposed placing the defences against a land attack. About eight hundred or a thousand yards to the right of this position and the contemplated depot there is an extensive range of heights that overlook and command them. In consequence of which, I am of opinion that this position cannot be defended from a land attack with a less force than would be competent to meet the assailants in the field. It is believed that a supply of oak timber may be obtained from the shores of York river; but pine, fit for naval purposes, and naval stores, must be drawn from a distance. A blockading force, in time of war, might prevent the transportation of them by water—the only means by which they could be obtained in any quantity. From the unusual straightness of York river, the mouth of which lies open to the bay, it is much more rough, with particular winds, than rivers of its width generally are.

With the wind blowing fresh up or down the river, I should apprehend that any repairs that would require working near the water would be interrupted. The inner harbor of this river, like that of Norfolk, cannot be left or entered when the wind is ahead, except by warping.

The next point embraced by your instructions is Tangier islands, lying about one hundred miles up the Chesapeake. From the survey and report of Captain Spence, the commissioners were of opinion that that place was totally unfit for a Naval Depot, and therefore did not proceed to examine it. For particular information respecting this place, I beg leave to refer to Captain Spence's survey and report.

As your instructions did not particularize St. Mary's, and not being apprized that my colleagues intended to examine that place, I was not present when they did so. It lies on the upper side of the Potomac river, near its mouth, and about an hundred and twenty miles up the Chesapeake Bay. I am unacquainted with the depth of water, the extent of the harbor, its susceptibility of defence against an attack by water, or the supply of naval stores or building materials in its vicinity.

From my want of local knowledge of this place, I can say nothing as to its particular advantages, and can only point out some prominent objections which present themselves. Its distance from the ocean I consider an insuperable objection to it as a Naval Depot and rendezvous, in consequence of the difficulty and detention our ships might meet with in going out or returning from sea. Another objection is, that the population for a considerable distance is so thin that it cannot afford sufficient succor in case of a sudden attack.

The river Patuxent lies a few miles higher up the bay than the Potomac, and approaches, where it is navigable for vessels of the largest class, within five miles of the rear of the harbor of St. Mary's. The harbor is everywhere surrounded on the land side by commanding heights, which are too numerous to be occupied and sustained, except by a large army; and, therefore, it would be necessary that a considerable land force should be kept there at all times, to insure its safety. Another very important objection is, that if the neighborhood does not afford sufficient supplies of timber, which I believe is the case, they might be cut off in time of war by a blockading force. This place, as well as the harbors of Norfolk and York, from the narrowness of its channel, can only be left or entered, when the wind is adverse, by warping. Its climate is very similar to the climate of those places. There is an objection common to both York and St. Mary's, as the places of Naval Deposits, which has not yet been mentioned, and that is, that they both lie within the defences proposed to be raised from the Horse-Shoe to the Middle Ground. If you present to an enemy the combined attractions of your depot and your fleet, those works for the defence of the bay must be more numerous and strong, and consequently much more expensive; and it is for this, among other reasons, that I think it so much preferable to place both these objects behind the defences proposed to be established at the mouth of Hampton Roads.

Having weighed all the advantages and disadvantages of the several positions, it is my decided opinion that the present navy yard at Norfolk, independent of the protection it would afford the Chesapeake, is, in all respects, incomparably the best place for a Naval Depot, if Hampton Roads be properly fortified; and in that case I should consider it the finest harbor I have ever seen. The only objection to it, in its present state, is the mud-bar at the mouth of the river, over which our largest ships cannot pass at low water; which is a sufficient objection in the present unprotected state of Hampton Roads, inasmuch as any of our larger ships, chased into the Roads by a superior naval force at dead low water, could not pass the bar at the mouth of the river, and would, of course, be exposed to attack. The expense of the requisite buildings for a Naval Depot, at either of the other places, together with the fortifications necessary for the protection of them by land and by water, would, in my opinion, be much greater than would be necessary to fortify Hampton Roads completely. Should either of the other places be fortified, they would require a much larger force to garrison them, and would render no material aid in the general defence of the Chesapeake. Permit me further to observe, sir, that it is the unanimous opinion of the Board that the waters of the Chesapeake should, at some point or other, be the place of a Naval Depot and rendezvous. The mildness of the climate enabling the workmen to continue their labor throughout almost the whole of the year, and the geographical situation of the place, seem to me to fit it eminently for this purpose. It is near the centre of our coast and of our commerce; and that portion of the Navy which would be stationed there, would possess thereby a facility in defending both by the rapid movements it would be enabled to make; and I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that, by raising the fortifications which I have proposed, and placing the depot near the ocean, the Chesapeake, at present the most vulnerable point of the coast, would become one of the strongest. It would become itself a defence to our seaboard.

The subjoined sketch of the waters in the vicinity of the Chesapeake, was furnished me, a¹ few hours' notice, by Mr. Adams, of the United States' Navy, who made the survey of the Chesapeake under the directions of the Board. The well known talents and precision of this gentleman, leave no doubt of the accuracy of his lines of bearing, distance, and soundings. You will perceive, sir, that I have drawn my facts relative to those points, from this document.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE.

December 27, 1816.

SIR: In compliance with the call made by you of the 16th ultimo, and for the reasons set forth in the communication made to you by the Board, of the 24th instant, I have now the honor to send, for your consideration, facts, and my own opinions, in relation to the points to which you have directed the attention of the Commissioners of the Navy, by your communication of the 7th May last.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

D. PORTER.

Hampton Roads, it is believed, could be fortified to advantage by means of batteries placed on Old Point Comfort, and on the shoal of Willoughby's Point, in fifteen feet water, and the distance between batteries so placed need not be more than one mile and a quarter. But until a fair experiment has been made as to the expense of erecting them—the effect of the latter on the shoals and channels, and whether it could resist the violence of the waves to which it would necessarily be exposed—I should not deem it advisable to undertake to defend the Chesapeake by erecting a line of batteries across the mouth of the Bay, as, by so doing, the risk would be incurred of expending uselessly many millions of dollars, of choking up the channel on one side, and of changing the navigation to the other; by obstructing the waters, and thereby causing them to ebb and flow in larger quantities, and with greater rapidity, on the north side of the mouth of the Bay, clearing away a passage for the largest ships, by the removal of the light, and almost floating sand on that side of the Middle Ground, where a safe and convenient channel already exists for vessels drawing sixteen feet water. A failure in the completion, or the ultimate destruction of the blocks, or islands, which must be sunk in the channel, for the purpose of erecting such batteries, would create dangerous shoals.*

and if perfect success should be obtained in the erection, it is quite problematical whether they would succeed at all times, and under all circumstances, in preventing the passage of a hostile fleet, or of securing to themselves the necessary supplies of provisions and water, when invaded by a powerful force. Therefore, for an uncertain object, I should consider it unadvisable to risk the destruction or injury of the present channel into the Chesapeake, and the opening of another that would require equal means to defend.

If Hampton Roads can be fortified, the Chesapeake Bay, in my opinion (which I submit with due deference) could be best protected by a moveable force, that can seek the protection of batteries placed there and at York river. The chart (not yet completed) of the survey made under the superintendence of the Commissioners, and the report of the surveying officer, will place you in possession of the distances, depths of water, and other facts that have produced this opinion, as well as of the information required by the examination of "Hampton Roads up to Norfolk." It, therefore, only remains for me to give my opinion as to the latter place for a Naval Depot. A want of sufficient depth of water, at all times, for the easy ingress and egress of the largest ships, I have always considered a strong objection to Norfolk as a great Naval Depot. The objection does not, however, exist to the extent I supposed. The minute examination which has lately been made, discovers more water over the flats, below Craney island, than was ever before found; but yet not of sufficient depth to float, at all times, ships of the largest class, with their provisions, water, and guns on board. Added to which, the channel is narrow, difficult to be found, and never to be passed, by ships of war, with a head wind. Under these circumstances, I can see no cause for changing the opinion formerly entertained; and will now add, that if a higher perfection in our naval architecture, or the increased size of our ships, should render a greater draught of water necessary, and our ships are not to be put into a state for service until their arrival in Hampton Roads; if they are then to receive their guns, their provisions, and their stores, from the Naval Depot; if Hampton Roads, instead of affording protection to the whole Chesapeake, is to answer only the purpose of protecting our inoffensive ships, the main object of a Naval Depot at the mouth of the Chesapeake, will be defeated, and the objections to Norfolk proportionably increased.

How far the fortifications of Hampton Roads may justify ships' dropping down there in a defenceless state will depend on experiments yet to be made, and on the extent of those experiments. It is now doubted whether one of our largest ships, under the most favorable circumstances, could steer through the narrow and crooked drain, which forms the channel over the flats, without grounding. The means, however, of determining this point are fortunately at hand, and it would not be difficult to make the trial. York river opposes no obstacles to the passage of the largest ships as high up as the Clay Banks, which appears to be the most suitable place on that stream for a navy yard. It offers advantages in streams of water for labor-saving purposes, and may be protected from maritime attack by batteries placed at York and Gloucester points, and near the channel on the Oyster Shoals above, (which are bare at low water,) as well as on the shoalest part of York Spit; and the passage of an enemy may be retarded by means of booms, and other obstructions. The climate is said to be subject to the same diseases as those which prevail at Norfolk, and it is said to be liable to attack from Severn river. It has, however, this advantage over Norfolk, (in addition to its depth of water,) that ships can go to sea with most winds with which they leave the place named as most suitable for a Naval Depot. Captain Sinclair's reports and survey of York river will afford you further information on this subject. The Tangier islands were surveyed by Captain R. T. Spence—to that survey and the report which accompanies it, I beg leave to refer you for all the information I possess respecting them.

Commodore Rodgers and myself, on our passage down the Potomac, in conformity with your instructions, touched in at St. Mary's which is situated near its mouth. In point of healthiness of situation, security from maritime attack, and (I am informed) from ice, excellence of harbor, and the easy ingress and egress to an inner harbor, at all times, to ships drawing not more than twenty-four feet and a half of water, the advantages it offers by means of streams of water for labor-saving purposes, and its convenience to forests of fine timber, St. Mary's is, in my opinion, superior to any other place of which I have a knowledge on the Chesapeake for a Naval Depot.

How far its distance from the sea, and the necessity for concentrating a land force for its protection from an enemy (which may attack it from the Patuxent) may weigh against these advantages, or whether it may be considered a disadvantage to have so concentrated, in a healthy situation, a force which may easily be transported for a protection of other important points, or, in fine, (taking into consideration its central position, and the speed with which vessels may get to sea with a favorable wind, through both channels of the Chesapeake,) whether such objections should be considered disadvantages, I beg leave to submit to the decisions of Government: they involve military question of which I am not a competent judge. I shall merely observe, firstly, that whatever objections may be made to the distance of St. Mary's from the ocean, when we measure the sinuosities of the channel, we shall find the objection nearly as strong to Norfolk. And when we take into estimation the time required to sail this distance, we shall find the comparison in favor of St. Mary's: and secondly, that whatever objection may be made to the assemblage of a military force for the protection of St. Mary's, still stronger objections might be made to their assemblage from the distant parts of Virginia, for the defence of Norfolk. And the same remark may apply to York. Norfolk has owed its protection to troops drawn from Richmond, which was thereby left exposed to attack. St. Mary's would be guarded by those from Baltimore and Washington, and placed in the most favorable situation to enable them to aid in their defence, as well as that of Richmond. The establishment of a Naval Depot at St. Mary's is not incompatible with the plan suggested for protecting the Chesapeake by means of a moveable force that shall seek the protection of batteries at Hampton Roads and York river. The protection of St. Mary's would depend greatly on that force, and the destruction of the Naval Depot, established there, would require a force (in addition to the one left to watch our fleet) proportioned to the protecting force stationed at St. Mary's; for it is not usual or prudent to leave an enemy unguarded in the rear, when he may be in a situation to avail himself of the advantages which a defeat might offer.

A superior enemy's fleet which could (by placing itself between the Naval Depot and St. Mary's, and our naval rendezvous at Hampton Roads) cut off all communication between them, could, by blockade, render both fleet and depot equally useless, were the latter at Norfolk. The command of our own waters, (the object for defending the mouth of the Chesapeake,) would secure to us an easy communication between our fleet and depot. And if this superiority is not to be obtained, our Naval Depot, placed wherever it may be, will not answer the end for which it was intended.

A Naval Depot at St. Mary's would afford a safe and commodious Winter retreat for our fleets, which experience has taught me cannot be found in Hampton Roads, and which I have reason to believe cannot be found in York river. It would, from its central and convenient situation, afford protection and convoy to the commerce of the whole bay, even were its mouth blockaded by an enemy's fleet; an advantage which could not be afforded by York or Norfolk. It would serve as a rendezvous for the light cruisers from Baltimore, where they could easily elude an enemy's blockading fleet, by availing themselves of the choice of channels; an advantage which York does not possess in so great a degree, and one of which Norfolk has been found to be entirely destitute. The blockade of the mouth of the Chesapeake would constitute the blockade of Hampton Roads; consequently the supplies of the Naval Depot, placed there, would be limited to those received by the canals, and by the waters discharging themselves into Hampton Roads; while the whole resources of the Chesapeake, and its tributary streams, as well as those which may be afforded by the projected canals connecting its waters with the Delaware, will be open to St. Mary's.

A military force stationed at St. Mary's can aid in the defence of every part of the bay exposed to attack, while such aid has never been found in the force stationed at Norfolk, nor is it believed it would in any stationed at York. And, finally, if the experiment of fortifying Hampton Roads should not succeed, a naval force that can issue from St. Mary's would not be less formidable, nor afford less protection to the Chesapeake, than one stationed there or at York.

In closing these remarks allow me to observe that I should regret extremely that any difference of opinion existed as to the most suitable point for establishing a Naval Depot, were I not persuaded that this indifference will be the means of placing you in possession of the best information as to the merits and defects of the places under examination. And I am happy to have in my power to say, that there appears to be but one opinion among the Commissioners as to the necessity of such an establishment somewhere on the waters of the Chesapeake. Reasons of a political nature which may weigh for or against the particular spot to be selected for a Naval Depot, I leave to politicians; unbiassed by local interests or local prejudices, I have given my opinion solely in regard to the utility of such an establishment. I give them with deference; but with a perfect conviction, in my own mind, of the correctness of the position, that the defence of the Chesapeake, and the utility of a Naval Depot on its waters, will depend more on the conveniences and resources it can furnish, than the position of the depot. A Naval Depot is the source whence all the members receive their supplies and vigor to defend, not a particular spot or place, but the whole body corporate—not for the advantage of any particular section, but for that of the whole Union.
